DARNLEY.

CHAPTER I.

My conscience will serve me to run from this Jew.

MERCHANT OF VENICE.

WE will now return to Lady Constance de Grey, whose fate must no longer be left in uncertainty; and taking up the thread of our narrative at the moment Sir Osborne quitted her, on the eventful evening which destroyed all his fond expectations, we will, in our homely way, record the events that followed.

It may be remembered, that at the very instant the Knight parted from good Dr. Wilbraham, at the door of the young lady's apartment in the Palace at Richmond, a letter was put into the clergyman's hands, to be delivered to the heiress of De Grey, for such was the style of the address. No time was lost by Dr. Wilbraham, in giving the letter to his Lady's hands; and, on being opened, it proved to be one of those anonymous epistles, which are seldom even worth the trouble of deciphering, being prompted always by some motive which dares not avow itself.

However, as Lady Constance was very little in the habit of receiving letters from any one, and certainly none to which the writer dared not put his name, mere curiosity would have prompted her, if nothing else, to read it through; the more especially as it was written in a fine and clerkly hand, and in a style and manner to be acquired alone by high and courtly education. Although the letter is still extant, we shall not copy it, having already given one specimen of the compositions of that day, and not at all wishing to depreciate the times of our hero and heroine, in the estimation of our more cultivated readers. Let it be considered as sufficient, then, that we merely say, the letter professed to be a warning from a friend, and informed the young lady, that the most rigorous measures were about to be adopted towards her, in case of her still refusing to comply with Wolsey's command, in respect to her marriage with Lord Darby. The writer then hinted that perpetual seclusion in a convent, together with the forfeiture of all her estates, would be the consequence, if she could not contrive to fly immediately; but that, if she could, her person, at least, would be at liberty, and that a friend would watch over her property; and, as a conclusion, he advised her to leave Richmond by water, as the means which would leave the least trace of her course.

So singularly did this letter anticipate not only her own fears, but also her own plans, that it instantly acquired, in the eyes of Lady Constance, an authenticity, which it did not otherwise possess; and placing it in the hands of Dr. Wilbraham, she asked his opinion upon its contents.

The very reverend Lord Cardinal will never try to make you marry against your will. Do not frighten yourself about it, my dear lady; depend on it, 'tis all nonsense.—Let me see it again.” But after he had read it over once more, Dr. Wilbraham's opinion seemed in some degree to change. He considered the letter, and re-considered it, with very thoughtful eyes, and then declared it was strange, that any one should write it, unless it were true; and yet he would not believe that either.—“Pray, lady, have you any idea who wrote it?” demanded he.

“I can imagine but one person,” said Lady Constance, “who could possess the knowledge and would take the pains.—Margaret, leave us,” she continued, turning to the waiting-woman. “I have heard, my dear Dr. Wilbraham,” she proceeded, as soon as they were alone, “that you were in former times acquainted with an old Knight, called Sir Cesar—I met him yesterday when I was out in the park—” Lady Constance paused, and a slight blush came into her cheek, as she remembered that the good clergyman knew nothing of the affection which subsisted between herself and Darnley ; and feeling a strong repugnance to say that he was with her at the moment, she hesitated, not knowing how to proceed.

Dr. Wilbraham relieved her, however, by exclaiming, the instant she stopped : “ Oh, yes, lady, in truth I know him well ! He was the dearest and the best friend of my Lord Fitzbernard ; and though unhappily given to strange and damnable pursuits—God forgive him—I must say, he was a friend to all the human race, and a man to be trusted and esteemed.—But think you this letter came from him ?”

“ He is the only one,” replied Constance, “ on whom my mind could for a moment fix, as having written it.”

“ It is very likely,” answered the clergyman : “ it is very likely ; and if it comes from him, you may believe every word that it contains. His knowledge, lady, is strange—is very strange—and is more than good—but it is sure.—He is one of those restless spirits that must ever be busy ; and human knowledge not being sufficient for his eager mind, he has sought more than he should seek, and found more than is for the peace of his soul."

"But if he make a good use of his knowledge," said Constance, "surely it cannot be very wicked, my dear sir?"

"It is presumptuous, lady," replied the clergyman; "it is most presumptuous, to seek what God has concealed from our poor nature."

"But if this letter be from him," said the lady, "and the bad tidings that it brings be true, what ought I to do? You, whom my dear father left with me, asking you never to quit me! you must be my adviser, and tell me what to do in this emergency; for sure I am, that you will never advise me to marry a man that I do not love, and who does not even love me."

"No, no, Heaven forbid! especially when you would rather marry Osborne," said the good clergyman with the utmost simplicity, looking upon it quite as a matter of course, which required no particular delicacy of handling:

“ And a much better thing too, lady, in every respect,” he continued, seeing that he had called up a blush in Constance’s cheek, and fancying that it arose from a fear of his disapproving her choice. “ If you will tell the Lord Cardinal all the circumstances, depend upon it he will not press you to do any thing you dislike. Let him have the whole history, my dear lady ; tell him that you do not love Lord Darby, and that he loves another ; and then show him how dearly Darnley loves you, and how you love him in return ; and then—”

“ Oh, hush, hush ! my dear Dr. Wilbraham,” cried the lady, with the blood glowing through her fair clear skin, over neck, and face, and forehead. “ Impossible ! indeed, quite impossible !—You forget.”

“ Oh yes, yes, I did forget,” replied the chaplain ; “ Osborne does not wish his name to be known—I did forget. Very true ! That is unfortunate.—But cannot you just insinuate that you do love some one else, but do not like to mention his name ?”

Lady Constance now endeavoured to make the simple clergyman understand, that under any circumstances she would be obliged to limit her reply to the Cardinal to a plain refusal to wed Lord Darby; and though he could not enter into any feelings of reluctance on her part to avow her regard for Darnley, yet he fully comprehended that she was bound to hold undivulged the confidence of others. However, he did not cease to lament that this was the case, fully convinced in his own mind, that if she had been able to inform Wolsey of every thing, the prelate, whom he judged after his own heart, would have unhesitatingly accorded his sanction to all her wishes: whereas, at present, her refusal might be attributed to obstinacy, being unsupported by any reasons: and thus indeed, he observed, Sir Cesar's prediction might be fulfilled, and she obliged to fly to screen herself from the consequences. Dr. Wilbraham having admitted that there might be a necessity for flight, the mind of Constance was infinitely quieted; that being a point on which she had long, long wished to ascertain his opinion, yet had timidly held back, believing him to be unacquainted with the most powerful motive that actuated her. Nothing now remained but to learn whether he would so far sanction her proceedings as to accompany her ; and she was considering the best means of proposing it to him, when she received a message to inform her that the Cardinal waited her in the little tapestried hall.

The moment which was to decide her fate, she plainly perceived to be now arrived ; but, with all the gentle sweetness of her character, a fund of dauntless resolution had descended to her from a long line of warlike ancestors, which failed not to come to her aid in moments of danger and extremity ; and though she had long dreaded the interview to which she was now called, she prepared to undergo it with courage and firmness. In obedience to the Cardinal's command, then, she descended to the hall, accompanied by two of her women, who, though neither likely to suffer any thing themselves, nor informed of their mistress's situation, yet felt much more alarm at the thoughts of approaching the imperious Wolsey, than even she did herself, burthened as her mind was with the certainty of offending a man the limit of whose power it was not easy to define.

At the door of the hall stood two of the Cardinal's ushers, by whom she was introduced into the chamber to which Wolsey had retired after leaving the King, and where, seated in a chair of state, he waited her approach with many an ensign of his pomp and power about him. As she entered, he fixed his eye upon her, scarcely rising from his seat, but still slightly bending his head in token of salutation. The high blood of De Grey, however, though flowing in a woman's veins, and one of the gentlest of her sex, was not made to humble itself before the upstart prelate; and moving forward unbidden, Lady Constance calmly seated herself in a chair opposite to that of the Cardinal, while her women placed themselves behind her; and thus, in silence, she waited for him to speak.

“Lady,” said Wolsey when she was seated, “at the time I saw you last, I proposed to you a marriage, which in point of rank, of fortune, and of every other accessory circumstance, is one which may well be counted amongst the best of the land, and for which I expected to have your thanks. Instead thereof, however, I received, at the moment of my departure for York, a letter wherein with a mild obstinacy and a humble pride, you did reject what was worthy of your best gratitude. A month now has waned since then, and I trust that calm reflection has restored you to your sense of what is right ; which being the case, all that is past shall be pardoned and forgot."

"Your proposal, my Lord Cardinal," replied Lady Constance, "was doubtless intended for my happiness, and therein you have my most sincere gratitude ; but yet I see not how I can have merited either reproof or pardon, in a matter which, alone concerning myself, no one can judge of but myself."

"You speak amiss, lady," said Wolsey haughtily ; "ay, and very boldly do you speak. Am I not your guardian by the English law, and are you not my ward ?—say, lady, say !"

"I am your ward, my Lord," replied Lady Constance, her spirit rising under his oppression, "but not your slave—you are my guardian, but not my master."

"You are nice in your refinements, lady," said the Cardinal; "but if I am your guardian, I am to judge what is good for you, till such time as the law permits you to judge for yourself."

"That time is within one month, my Lord," answered Constance; and even were it longer, I never yet did hear, that a guardian could force a ward to wed against her will; though I at once acknowledge his right to forbid her marriage, where he may judge against it."

"Nay!" exclaimed Wolsey, "this is somewhat too much. This bold spirit, lady, becomes you not, and must be abated. Learn, that though I, in gentleness, rule you but as a ward, and, for your own good, control your stubborn will, the King, your sovereign, may act with a stronger hand, and, heedless of your idle fancies, compel you to obey."

"Then to the King, my sovereign, I appeal," said Constance, "sure that his justice and his clemency will yield me that protection which, God help me, I much need."

"Your appeal is in vain, proud girl!" cried the Cardinal, rising angrily, while the fiery spirit flashed forth from his dark eye. "I stand here armed in this case with the King's power, and commissioned to speak his will; and 'tis in his name that I command you, on Thursday next, at God's altar, to give your hand to your noble cousin, Lord Darby—ay! and gratefully to give it, without which you may fall to beggary and want; for know, that all those broad lands which now so swell your pride, are claimed by Sir Payan Wileton, in right of male descent, and may pass away like a shadow from your feeble hand, leaving you nought but your vanity for dowry."

"Then let them pass," said Constance firmly; "for I would sooner a thousand times be landless, friendless, hopeless, than wed a man I do not love."

"And end your days in a nunnery, you should have added to the catalogue of woes you call upon your head," said the Cardinal sternly;

“for as I live, such shall be your fate.—Choose either to give your vows to your cousin, or to Heaven, lady ; for no other choice shall be left you.—Till Thursday next I give you to decide ; and while you ponder, York Place shall be your abode.—Lady, no more,” he added, seeing her about to speak ; “ I have not time to argue against your fine wit. To-night, if I reach Westminster in time, I will send down your litter ; if not, to-morrow, by eight of the clock ; and be you prepared—I have done.”

Constance would not trust her voice with any reply, for the very efforts she had made to conceal her agitation had but served to render it more overpowering ; and it was now ready to burst forth in tears. Repressing them, however, she rose, and bending her head to the Cardinal, returned to her own apartments. Here Dr. Wilbraham awaited her in no small anxiety ; to know the event of her conference with Wolsey, which, as it had been so short, he judged must be favourable. Lady Constance soon undeceived him, however ; and shocked and indignant at the Cardinal’s haughty and tyrannical conduct, he agreed at once with the lady that she had no resource but flight.

“It is very strange! very strange indeed!” cried the good man; “I have often heard that the Lord Cardinal is haughty and cruel,—and indeed men lay to his charge that he never does any thing but for his own interests; but I would never believe it before. I thought that God would never have placed so much power in the hands of so bad a man: but his ways are inscrutable; and his name be praised! Now, my dear lady, what is to be done? Where are we to go? Had not I better go and tell Osborne, that he may know all about it?”

“On no account,” replied Constance; “however painful it may be, my good friend,—and painful indeed it is I acknowledge,”—and while she spoke the long repressed tears burst forth, and rolled rapidly over her face,—“I must go without even bidding him adieu. I would not for the world involve him at this time in a business which might bring about his ruin. He shall be innocent even of the knowledge of my flight, so that Wolsey shall have no plea against him. When his fate is fixed, and the storm is blown away, I will let him know where I am; for I owe him that at least.—Even for you, my good Dr. Wilbraham, I fear,” she continued. “If you fly with me, may it not bring down upon your head some ecclesiastical censure? If so, for Heaven’s sake, let me go with Margaret alone.”

“Why it may, indeed,” answered the chaplain thoughtfully. “I had forgot that. It may indeed. What can be done?”

“Then you shall stay,” replied Lady Constance with some degree of mournfulness of accent at the thought of the friendless loneliness with which she was going to cast herself upon the wide inhospitable world. “Then you shall stay indeed.”

“What! and leave you to wander about alone, I know not whither?” cried the good clergyman. “No, my child, no! Did all the dangers in the world hang over my head, where you go, there will I go too. If I cannot protect you much, which, God help me! is not in my power, at least I can console you under your sorrows, and support you during your pilgrimage, by pointing continually to that Being who is the protector of the widow and the orphan, the friend of the friendless and the desolate—Lady, I will go with you. All the dangers in the world shall not scare me from your side.”

A new energy seemed to have sprung up in the bosom of the clergyman ; and by his advice and assistance Lady Constance’s plans and arrangements for her flight were very soon completed.

It was agreed that herself, Dr. Wilbraham, and Mistress Margaret, the waiting-woman, should immediately take boat, and proceed by water to the little village of Tothill, from whence a walk of five minutes would bring them to the house of the physician Dr. Butts, who, as the old chaplain observed, was, though his nephew, a man of an active and piercing mind, and would probably find some means to facilitate their escape to France. By landing some little way from his house, they hoped to prevent their route from being traced afterwards, and thus to evade pursuit; as to be overtaken and brought back, would involve far more danger than even to remain where they were and dare the worst.

All this being determined between Lady Constance and the clergyman, Mistress Margaret was called in, and informed of as much of the plan as was necessary to enable her to make up her mind whether she would accompany her young lady or not. Without a moment's hesitation, she decided upon going, and having received her orders, proceeded to arrange for their journey such articles of apparel as were absolutely necessary, together with all her lady's money and jewels. She also was deputed to inform the other servants that Lady Constance thought it best to follow the Lord Cardinal to York Place immediately, instead of waiting for the litter which he had promised to send, and that she only permitted herself and Dr. Wilbraham to accompany her.

Every thing being ready, a man was sought to carry the two large bags, to which their baggage was restricted; and Constance prepared to put in execution the very important step on which she had determined. Her heart sank, it is true, and her spirit almost failed, as Dr. Wilbraham took her by the hand to lead her to the boat; but remembering to what she would expose herself if she stayed, she recalled her courage, and proceeded on her way.

In the antechamber, however, she had a painful scene to go through, for her women, not deceived by Mrs. Margaret's tale, clung round their mistress for what they deemed might be a last farewell. All of them, born upon her father's lands, had grown up as it were with her; and, for some good quality, called from amongst the other peasantry to the honour of serving the heiress of De Grey, had become attached to her by early habit, as well as by the affection which her gentle manners and sweet disposition were certain to produce in all those by whom she was surrounded. Many a bitter tear was shed by the poor girls as they saw their lady about to leave them; and Constance herself, unable to refrain from weeping, thereby not only encouraged their grief, but confirmed their fears. Angry with herself for giving way to her feelings when she felt the absolute necessity of governing them strictly, Constance gently disengaged herself from her maids, and promising to let them hear of her soon, proceeded to the water-side, where they easily procured a boat to convey them down the river.

The irrevocable step was now taken, and Constance and the chaplain both sat in silence, contemplating the vague future, and striving, amidst all the dim uncertain shapes that it presented, to ascertain even, as far as probability went, what might be their own fate. But the dark impenetrable curtain, drawn ever between to-day and to-morrow, still barred their view; leaving only room for hope and fear to range within the wide circle of unceasing doubt.

Long before arriving at Tothill, the sun had gone down; and the cold wind blowing from the river, chilled Lady Constance as she sat in the open boat without any other covering than a long veil added to her ordinary apparel. Notwithstanding this, she judged it best to bid their two rowers continue their course as far as Westminster, fearing that the little knowledge of the localities possessed either by Dr. Wilbraham or herself, might cause them to lose their way if they pursued their original intention of landing at Tothill, and hoping that the darkness, which was now coming thick upon them, would at least conceal their path from the boat to the house of Dr. Butts. To insure this, as soon as they had landed, Mrs. Margaret took one of the bags, and the good clergyman the other, and having satisfied the boatmen for their labour, the whole party began to thread the narrow tortuous lanes and streets, constituting the good town of Westminster.

After various turnings and windings, however, they discovered that they were not on the right track, and were obliged to ask their way of an old locksmith, who was just shutting up his shop. The direction they received from the worthy artificer was somewhat confused, and contained so many rights and lefts, that by the time they had taken two more turnings, each person of the three had got a different reading of the matter, and could in no way agree as to their farther proceeding

“ He said we were to go on, in this street, till we came to a lantern, I am sure,” said Dr. Wilbraham.

“ No, no, Sir,” cried Mrs. Margaret, “ it was the next street after we had turned to the left. Did he not say, take the first street to the right, and then the first again to the right, and then the second to the left, and then go on till we came to a lantern ?”

Dr. Wilbraham denied the position ; and the matter was only terminated by Constance proposing that they should proceed to the second turning at least. “ Then if we see a light in the street to the left,” she continued, “ we may reasonably suppose that that is the turning he meant, unless before that we find a lantern here too, and then we can but ask again— But make haste, my dear Dr. Wilbraham, for there is a man behind who seems as if he were watching us !”

This last observation quickened all their motions, and proceeding as fast as possible, they found that Mrs. Margaret was in the right; for immediately in the centre of the second turning to the left appeared a lantern, shedding its dim small light down the long perspective of the street: which, be it remarked, was highly favoured in having such an appendage; few and scanty being the lights that, in that age, illuminated the streets of London after dark. Pursuing their way, then, towards this brilliant luminary, with many a look behind to ascertain whether they were followed, which did not appear to be the case, they found another street diverging to the right, which shared in the beneficent rays of the lantern, and which, also, conducted into a known latitude, namely a little sort of square, that the chaplain instantly recognised as being in the immediate proximity of his nephew's dwelling.

The house of Dr. Butts now soon presented itself; and entering the little court before it, the clergyman was just about to knock against a door which fronted them, when some one entering the court from the street, laid hold of his arm, saying, "Stop, stop! If you please! you must come with me to my Lord Cardinal."

CHAPTER II.

“Come with words as medicinal as true,
Honest as either.”

SHAKSPEARE.

Now there are many people who would here leave their reader in suspense, and, darting off to some other part of the tale, would not give the most remote hint of Lady Constance's fate, till they had drawled through two or three long chapters about a frog and a roasted apple, or any other thing, if possible, still more irrelevant. But far be such disingenuous dealing from me, whose sole aim, intent, and object, is to give my reader pleasure; and by now and then detailing some little accident or adventure, to keep him just enough awake to prevent the volume falling out of his hand into the fire; to win sometimes a smile, and sometimes a sigh ; without aspiring either to laughter or tears ; tickling his soul, as it were, with the point of a feather, so as neither to rouse nor to lull, and to leave him in such a state, that when he lays down the book, he knows not whether he has been reading or dreaming.

Such are the luxurious aspirations of Vonderbrugius, who is recorded to have himself written more than one volume in his sleep, and to have carried them even to the printer in a state of somnambulency. After this, without more ado, he proceeds to relate, that the worthy Dr. Wilbraham, finding somebody take him by the arm, turned round in a state of vexation and worry, if I may use the word, which overcame the natural gentleness of his disposition, and made him demand, rather sharply, what the stranger wanted with him.

“ Why, Doctor,” replied the man, “ you must come instantly to my Lord Cardinal, who has been struck with the pestilent air in returning from Richmond, and desires to consult with you on the means of preventing its bad effects.”

“ Pshaw !” cried the good chaplain pettishly,

“I am not Dr. Butts! How could you frighten me so? We come to see the Doctor ourselves.”

“Stand out of the way, then, if you are not him,” cried the man, changing his tone, and rudely pushing between the clergyman and Lady Constance. “The Cardinal must be served first, before such as you, at least;” and knocking loudly against the door, he soon brought forth a page, who informed him that the physician was at the house of old Sir Guy Willoughby, further down in the same street.

On this news, the messenger immediately set off again, leaving Dr. Wilbraham to discuss what matters he liked with the page, now that his own insolent haste was satisfied. The servants instantly recognised their master’s uncle, and permitted him, with his fair companions, to enter and take possession of his book-room, while awaiting his return; and the rosy maid, whom Sir Osborne had found scrubbing crucibles, now bustled about with good humoured activity to make the lady comfortable.

Long seemed the minutes, however, to the mind of poor Constance, till the physician’s return. Her path was now entirely amidst uncertainties, and at each step she knew not whether it would lead her to safety or destruction. Such a proceeding as that in which she was engaged does not strike one, when calmly related, as full of half the anxiety and alarm that really accompanied it. Let it be remembered, that not only her fortune but her liberty for life, and the whole happiness of her existence, were involved; and it may be then conceived with what trembling fear she awaited each incident that might tend to forward her escape, or to betray her flight.

Though it seemed to her an age, Dr. Butts was not really long in returning; but no language can depict the astonishment of his countenance, when he beheld Lady Constance with his uncle. "Odds life!" cried he; "what is this? Lady, are you ill, or well, or wise? —Uncle, are you mad, or drunk, or foolish?"

The good clergyman informed him that he was in neither of the predicaments that he alluded to; and then proceeded to relate the circumstances and motives which had induced them to resolve upon leaving the court of England and flying to France, to claim the protection of the French king, who was in fact the lady's sovereign as far as regarded her maternal estates.

“It's a bad business!” cried Dr. Butts, who still stood in the middle of the floor, rubbing his chin, and not yet recovered from his surprise. “It's a bad business! I always thought it would be a bad business! Nay, nay, lady, do not weep,” continued the kind-hearted mediciner, seeing the tears that began to roll silently over Constance's cheek: “It is not so bad as that. Wolsey will doubtless claim you at the hands of the French king; but Francis is not a man to give you up. However, take my advice—retire quietly to one of your chateaux, and live like a nun, till such time as this great friendship between the two courts is past. It will not last long,” he added, with a sententious shake of the head; “it will not last long. But, nevertheless, you keep yourself in France, as secretly as may be, while it does last.”

“But how to get to France is the question,”

said Dr. Wilbraham. "We shall do well enough when we are there, I doubt not. It is how to get to France, that we must think of."

"Oh, we will manage that," replied Dr. Butts; "we will manage that; though, indeed, these are not things that I like to meddle with; but nevertheless, I suppose I must in this case. Nay, nay, my dear lady, do not grieve. 'Slife! you a soldier's daughter and afraid! Nay, cheer up, cheer up. It shall all go right, I warrant."

The Doctor now seated himself, and observing that Constance looked pale and cold, he insisted on her swallowing a Venice glass of mulled sack, and going to bed. As to the sack, he said, he would insure it for the best in Europe; and in regard to the beds in his house, he could only say, that he had once entertained the four most famous alchymists of the world, and they were not men to sleep on hard beds. "Taste the sack, lady; taste the sack!" he continued. "Believe me, it is the best medicine in the pharmacy, and certainly the only one I ever take myself. Then, while you go and court your pillow, I will devise some scheme with this good uncle of mine, to help you over the Frenchman's shore."

The physician's rosy maid was now called, and conducted Lady Constance and Mrs. Margaret to a handsome bed-chamber, where we shall leave them for the present; and without prying into Dr. Butts's household furniture, return to the consultation that was now going on below.

"Well, uncle," said the physician, as soon as Lady Constance had left them, "you have shown your wisdom truly, in running away with an heiress, for another man. On my life, you have beaten the man who was hanged for his friend, saying that he would do as much for him another time. Why, do you know, you can never show your face in England again?"

"My good nephew," replied Dr. Wilbraham quietly, "for all your fine words, if you had been in my situation, you would have done just as I have done.—I know you, Charles."

"Not I, i'faith," cried Dr. Butts: "I would not have budged a foot."

"What! when you saw her cast upon the world, friendless, and helpless," cried the old man, "with nobody to advise her, with nobody to aid her, with nobody to console her? So sweet a girl, too! such an angel in heart, in mind, in disposition—all desolate, and alone, in this wide rough world!—Fie, Charles, fie! You would have gone with her!"

"Perhaps I might, perhaps I might," replied the physician; "however, let us now think of the best means of serving her. What can be done?"

As usual in such cases, fifty plans were propounded, which, on examination, were found to be unfeasible. "I have it," cried Dr. Butts, at last, after discarding an infinite variety: "There was a nun's litter came up yesterday, to the Inn hard by. It will hold three; and you shall set off to-morrow by daybreak, as nuns."

"But how?" cried Dr. Wilbraham, with horror and astonishment depicted in his face. "You don't mean me to go as a nun?"

"Faith, but I do!" replied the physician: "it would be fully as bad for you to be discovered, as for Lady Constance. Now, there is no dress in the world, that I know of, but a nun's, that will cover your face, and hide your beard. —Oh, you shall be a nun, by all means. I will get the three dresses this very night, from a frippery in Pool-street. I will knock them up, and you shall be well shaved to-morrow morning, and will make as fine an old sister monica as the best of them.”

Dr. Wilbraham still held out stoutly, declaring that he would not so disguise himself, and disgrace his cloth, on any account or consideration; nor was it till the physician showed him plainly, that by this means alone Lady Constance’s safety could be insured, that he would at all hear of the travesty thus proposed.

“Where, then, do you intend us to go?” asked Dr. Wilbraham, almost crying with vexation, at the bare idea of being so metamorphosed. “I cannot, and I will not, remain long in such a dress.”

“Why, you must go down to Sandwich,” answered the physician. “There is a religious house there, under a sub-prioress, about a mile out of the town, looking out over the sea. I know the dame, and a little money will do much with her. Nay, look not shocked, good uncle.

I mean not to say that she is wicked, and would endanger her soul's repose for mammon ; but she is one of those that look leniently on small faults, and would not choke at such an innocent sin, as helping you out of the Cardinal's power. The time is lucky too, for the cold wind last night has given his haughty Lord Cardinalship a flow of humours to the head, and he is as frightened about himself as a hen before a dray horse ; so that, perhaps, he may not think of sending to Richmond so soon as he proposed.

“ But Charles,” said Dr. Wilbraham, whose abhorrence of the nun's dress was not to be vanquished, and who would have been right glad to escape the infliction on any excuse ; “ will not your servants, who have seen us come in one dress, think it very strange when they see us go away in another ?—and may they not betray us ?”

“ Pshaw !” cried Dr. Butts, “ they see a thousand odder things every day, in a physician's house. Do you think I let my servants babble ? No, no ! They know well, that they must have neither eyes, ears, nor understanding, for any thing that passes within these doors.

If I were to find that they ever did so much as to recollect a person they had once seen with me, they should troop. But stay: go you to bed and rest. I will away for these dresses, and bespeak the litter for to-morrow, at five.—At Sandwich, you are sure to find a bark for Boulogne.”

The next morning, Dr. Wilbraham was awake before it was light, by the physician entering his room with a candle in his hand, and followed by a barber; who, taking the good priest by the nose, shaved him most expeditiously, before he was out of bed, having been informed by Dr. Butts, that the person under his hands was a poor insane patient, who would not submit to any very tedious tonsorial operation.

When this was done, much to the surprise of the chaplain, who was, in truth, scarcely awake, the barber was sent away, and the physician produced the long black dress of a Benedictine Nun, into which, after much entreaty, he persuaded Dr. Wilbraham to get: not, however, without the rest of his clothes; for no argument would induce him to put on the woman's dress, without the man's under it. First, then, he was clothed with his ordinary black vest, and silk hose, above which came a full and seemly cassock ; and then, as a superstructure, was placed on the top of all, the long black robes of the nun, which swelled his bulk out to no inconsiderable size. This, however, was not a disadvantage, for being tall and thin, he had great need of some supposititious contour, to make his height seem less enormous, when conjoined with his female habiliments. Upon the whole, with the rope tied tight round his middle, and the coif and veil, he made a very respectable nun, though there was in the whole figure, a certain long-backed rigidity of carriage, and straggling wideness of step, that smacked infinitely of the masculine gender.

When all was completed, the physician led his transformed uncle down to a little hall, to which Lady Constance and Mrs. Margaret had already found their way, habited in similar garments, to those which Dr. Butts had furnished for the chaplain.

In point of beauty, Constance had never, perhaps, looked better than now, when her small exquisite features, and clear delicate complexion, slightly shaded by the nun's cap, had acquired an additional degree of softness, which harmonized well with the pensive, melancholy expression that circumstances had communicated to her countenance. However, she was, perhaps, even more sad and agitated than the night before, when haste had, in some degree, superseded thought. She had now past a nearly sleepless night, during the long hours of which a thousand fears and anxieties had visited her pillow, and on rising, the necessity of quitting her customary dress, and assuming a disguise, impressed more strongly than ever upon her mind the dangers of her situation.

The only person that seemed fully in their element, was Mrs. Margaret, who though, with the exception of a little selfishness, a most excellent being, could not be expected to have fulfilled for several years the high functions of lady's maid, without having acquired some of the spirit of the office. God knows, in Lady Constance's service, she had possessed small opportunity of exercising, in any way, her talents for even the little intrigue d'antichambre; and though, in the case of Sir Osborne, she had done her best to show her tact by retiring à propos, the present was the first occasion on which she could enjoy a real, bustling, energetic adventure; and to do her justice, she enacted the nun to the life. With a vastly consequential air, she hurried about, till the rustling of her black serge and the rattling of her wooden cross and rosary were quite edifying; and finding herself, by dress at least, on an equality with her mistress, she took the bridle off her tongue, and let it run its own course, which it did not fail to do with great vigour and activity.

On the entrance of Dr. Wilbraham, with his face clad in rueful solemnity, and his long strides, at every step spreading out the petticoats with which his legs were environed, like the parachute of a balloon when it begins to descend, Mrs. Margaret laughed outright, and even Lady Constance, while reproving her for her ill-placed gaiety, could hardly forbear a smile.

“My dear Dr. Wilbraham,” said Constance, seeing the chagrin that sat upon his countenance, “for how much, how very much have I to thank you! And believe me, I feel deeply all the regard you must have for me, to induce you to assume a disguise that must be so disagreeable to you."

"Well," said Dr. Butts, "you are a sweet creature, and to my mind it would not be difficult to make a man do any thing to serve you. However, sit you down, lady; here is something to break your fast; and as it must serve for dinner and supper too, I will have you eat, whether you are hungry or not; for there must be as little stopping on the road as possible, and no chattering, Mrs. Margaret; mind you that."

Mrs. Margaret vowed that she was silence itself; and the meal which the good Doctor's foresight had taken care to provide for them, being ended, he led them forth by a different door from that which had given them entrance, not choosing to trust even the servants, whose discretion he had boasted the night before. Day had now dawned, and in the court-yard of the inn they found a large litter, or sort of long box, swung between two horses, one before and the other behind, and accompanied by a driver on horseback, who smacking his whip, seemed tired of waiting for them.

“Come, get in, get in,” cried he, “I have been waiting half an hour. There’s room enough for you, sure!” he proceeded, seeing some little difficulty occur in placing the travellers: “why, I brought four just like you up from Gloucester in it, three days ago.—Here, come over to this side, Mother Longshanks.” This address to Dr. Wilbraham had again very near upset Mrs. Margaret’s gravity; but at length all being placed, in spite of the chaplain’s long legs, which were rather difficult to pack, the travellers took leave of the physician, and commenced their journey to the sea coast.

All passed on tranquilly enough during the forenoon; and at a little watering-house, where they stopped on the road, they were enabled quietly to rehearse their parts, as Sister Wilbraham, Sister Margaret, and Sister Grey. The good clergyman declared, that his part should be to keep down his veil and hold his tongue, and Mrs. Margaret willingly undertook to be the talker for the whole party, while Constance, not yet at all assured of safety, listened for every sound with a beating heart, and trembled at every suspicious look that she beheld, or fancied that she beheld, in the people round her.

As soon as the horses were sufficiently refreshed, they again began their journey, and had proceeded some way, when the galloping of a horse made itself heard behind them, and through the opening of the curtains they could perceive a serjeant-at-arms, with full cognizance, and accompanied by two followers, pass by the side of their vehicle. In a moment after, he stopped on overtaking their driver, who was a little in advance, and seemed to question him in a hasty tone. "Three nuns!" cried he, at length. "I must see that!"

Constance, almost fainting, drew back in the corner of the litter. Dr. Wilbraham shrunk himself up to the smallest space possible; and in fact, Mrs. Margaret was the only one who preserved her presence of mind. "If it were the Lord Cardinal himself," whispered she to her lady, "he would never know you, my Lady, in that dress."

In the mean time, the serjeant-at-arms rode up, and drew back the curtain of the litter. "Your pardon, ladies," said he, giving a look round, which seemed quite satisfactory, "I ask your pardon; but as I am sent in pursuit of some runaways, I was obliged to look in."

Here the matter would have terminated, had not Mrs. Margaret, desirous of showing off a total want of fear, replied, "Quite welcome, fair Sir, quite welcome. We are travelling the same road." The officer replied; and this brought on a long allegory on the part of Mrs. Margaret, who told him that they were nuns of Richborough, who had been to London for medical advice for poor Sister Mary, there, in the corner, (pointing to Dr. Wilbraham) who was troubled with the falling sickness. The sergeant-at-arms recommended woodlice drowned in vinegar, as a sovereign cure, which the pretended nun informed him they had tried; and though it must be owned that the abigail played her part admirably well, yet, nevertheless, she contrived to keep her lady and the chaplain in mortal fear for half an hour longer than was necessary.

At length, however, the officer taking his leave, rode away ; and then descended upon the head of Mrs. Margaret, the whole weight of good Doctor Wilbraham's indignation. Not for many years had he preached such an eloquent sermon upon the duty of adhering strictly to truth, as on the present occasion ; and he pointed clearly out to the waiting-woman, that she had told at least two-and-thirty lies more than the circumstances required. Mrs. Margaret, however, was obstinate in her error, and would not see the distinction, declaring angrily, that she would either tell no lies at all, and let it be known who they were, or she would tell as many as she thought proper.

“ Margaret !” said Lady Constance, in a calm reproachful tone, that had more effect than a more violent reproof, “ You forget yourself.” The abigail was silent ; but nevertheless she determined, in her own mind, to give the good Doctor more truth than he might like, on the very first occasion ; and such an opportunity was not long in occurring.

With the usual hankering which drivers and postilions always have for bad inns, the master of the litter did not fail to stop for the night at one of the smallest, meanest, and most uncomfortable little alehouses on the road; and on getting out of the vehicle, the three nuns were all shown into one room, containing two beds, one large and one small one. It may easily be supposed that such an arrangement did not very well suit the circumstances of the case; and Constance looked at Dr. Wilbraham, and Dr. Wilbraham at Constance, in some embarrassment. On inquiring whether they could not have another room, they were informed that there was indeed such a thing in the house, but that it was always reserved for guests of quality. The hostess was surprised at nuns giving themselves such airs: the room they had would do very well for three people—and, in short, that they should have no other.

During all this time, Mrs. Margaret remained obstinately silent, but at length, seeing the distress of her mistress, she brought up her forces to the charge, and turned the tide of battle. Attacking the hostess full tilt, she declared that there should be another room found directly, informing her, that the young lady was not a simple nun, but noble and rich, and just named Prioress of, the Lord knows where ; that Sister Mary—i. e. Dr. Wilbraham, was badly troubled with a night-cough, which would keep the Prioress awake all night ; and in short, that Sister Mary must, and should, have a room to herself, for which, however, they would willingly pay.

This latter hint overcame the hostess's objections, and the matter being thus settled, they were allowed to repose in peace for the night. Fatigue, anxiety, and want of sleep, had now completely exhausted Constance ; and weariness acting the part of peace, closed her eyes in happy forgetfulness, till the next morning, when they again set out for Sandwich.

Without any new adventure, they arrived at that town ; and after passing through it, quickly perceived the convent rising on a slight elevation to the left. As soon as this was in sight, so that he could not miss his way, Dr. Wilbraham got out of the litter, for the purpose of pulling off his nun's dress under some hedge, in order that, by following a little later than themselves, he might appear at the gate of the nunnery in his true character, without the change being remarked by the driver of the litter, to whom he said on descending, that he would follow on foot.

After this, Constance and Mrs. Margaret proceeded alone, and in a few minutes reached the convent, where presenting Dr. Butts's letter to the Prioress, they were received with all kindness and attention, and found themselves comparatively free from danger. Dr. Wilbraham was not long in arriving, restored to his proper costume ; and being admitted to the parlour, entered into immediate consultation with the Superior and Constance, as to the best means of concluding their flight as happily as it had commenced.

CHAPTER III.

So catchers
And snatchers
Do toile both night and day,
Not needie,
But greedie,
Still prolling for their prey.

HOWEVER a poor novelist may like to pursue the even tenor of his way in peace and quietness, it is quite impossible for him to do so, if he take a true story for the basis of his tale. Circumstance is always jumping about ; and if he would follow Nature, he must join in the game of leap-frog too. Here, is the Palace of Fortune, with its glitter, and its splendour, and its show ; and there the Cottage of Want, with its care, and its foulness, and its misery. In one house, new-born life is coming into the world, all joyous ; in the next, stern death leads man away to eternity : weeping sorrow, and laughing joy, sit mocking each other at every step ; and smiles, and tears, are still running after each other on the high road, though little formed to bear company together. Since, then, the world is full of oppositions and of jumps, he that copies it must sit upon his hind legs, and play the kangaroo also.

I found it necessary to put forth this excuse, before proceeding with Vonderbrugius ; who, without offering any reason for so doing, suddenly flies back to scenes that we have not long quitted, and brings the reader once more to London, where he shall be detained as short a time as possible, on the word of a scribe.

All those who have read the history of that little powerful nook of island earth, called Great Britain, must very well know, that the imperious minister of Henry the Eighth was not one to receive contradiction with patient resignation : what then was his rage on hearing that Lady Constance de Grey was not to be found at Greenwich ? True to what he threatened,

Wolsey had not failed, immediately on arriving in London, to send a horse-litter down to Richmond for his fair ward, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, and the cold he had himself experienced on the water; and towards eleven the same night, his messengers returned, informing him that the lady was not to be found in the palace; adding also, that a man belonging to the gate had been employed to carry some luggage for her down to a two-oared boat, which had received her at the stairs, and rowed off towards Westminster.

This was the sum of all the news they had obtained, but it was sufficient to guide Wolsey on the search which he instantly prepared to institute for the fugitive. Before going to rest, he took every precaution for preventing her leaving the kingdom, ordered messengers to set out early the next morning for every port where she was likely to embark, and commanded an officer to post to Richmond that very night, and stationing himself at the palace-stairs, to await the arrival of the men who rowed the boat which had conveyed her away, giving him at the same time an order for their arrest.

In regard to the couriers to the various ports, we shall leave them to their fate, not embarrassing ourselves with a search half over the realm, but shall pursue the movements of the other messenger, from whose operations very important results were obtained.

Though heartily wishing the Cardinal and Lady Constance at the devil, the one as the proximate, the other as the remote cause of his night-ride, the officer got into his saddle, and accompanied by two followers, set out for Richmond, where they arrived towards two o'clock in the morning.

Men of a curious and philosophic mind have remarked, that there is always a pot-house near a waterman's stairs; and the same fact was observable in the present instance. Nearly opposite to the landing on the left-hand side, stood the hospitable mansion of a beer-retailer, who dealt out the British nectar to all those who had the means of paying for it; and in his window, even at the hour of two o'clock, was shining a lamp, whereat the officer mar-velled, as the neighbourhood of the palace enjoined order and sobriety amongst the multitude. Riding up, however, he dismounted; and pushing open the door, perceived that the tap-room was occupied by a single individual of the waterman species, whose sleepy head, nodding backwards and forwards, often approached so near the lamp upon the table, as to threaten his red nose with a conflagration. Without any regard for the rites of Morpheus, the officer shook the sleeper heartily by the shoulder, whereupon he started up, crying, "Well, I'm ready—how long you've been—I've been a waiting this hour."

"Waiting for whom?" demanded the officer; "not for me, I'm sure, or with my will, you'd waited long enough."

"Lord bless us, Sir! I beg your worship's pardon," said the man, rubbing his eyes; "I thought you were the two yeomen that hired my boat to take the young lady to Lunnun. They promised to be back by one, and so master tapster lets me sit up here for 'em. I thought you were them two indeed."

"No, I'm a single man, and never was two in my life," answered the officer. "But about these two yeomen?—At one o'clock you say they were to come?—Pray, how came you to let them your boat?"

"Lord! because they asked me, sure," replied the waterman, "that 's how."

"But how do you know they will ever bring it back again?" demanded the officer.

"Because they left me ten marks as a pledge," answered the other. "No, no, I wasn't to be outwitted. I saw they wanted the boat very bad, so I let them have it for a mark by the day; but I made them leave me ten others; so if the boat be lost or hurt, I've got double its worth in my own pocket."

"And what did they say they were going to do with it?" demanded the officer.

"Oh, I didn't ask," said the waterman; "but walking about, I saw them lay there at the stairs for near an hour, till presently comes down a young lady, and an old priest, and a waiting-woman, as I judged, and in they get, and away rows the boat toward Lunnun. They were lusty rowers, I warrant you, and good at the trade. But your worship seems mighty curious about them."

“Ay, and so curious,” answered the officer, “that they shall both go with me to London, if they come hither to-night; and you too, Master Waterman, so hold yourself ready. Ho, Thomas! come in and stay with this worthy. See that he does not budge. You Will, put up the horses, and then come down to me at the stairs.”

The excellent tipstaff now, after cutting short the remonstrance of the boatman, proceeded to the water side, and crossing his arms, waited, with his eyes fixed upon the bright river, as it flowed on, rippling like waves of silver in the moonshine. In a few minutes he was joined by his follower, and before long a black spot appeared moving up the midst of the stream, while the plashing of distant oars began to make itself heard. As the boat came nearer, two men were plainly to be seen rowing it towards the landing-place, one of whom raising his head, when they were within a few yards distance, exclaimed, “Is that you, Master Perkins?”

“Ay, ay!” answered the officer, imitating, as well as he could, the gruff halloo of a waterman, and walking about with his hands in his breeches' pockets, as if to keep himself warm.

Without more ado, the boat pulled to the shore, and one of the men jumped out, whereupon the officer instantly caught him by the collar, exclaiming, "In the King's name, I charge you go with me."

"Pull off! pull off," cried the man to his companion; "by the Lord he has grabbed me—pull off, boy!"

The other rower, without scruple, pushed from the shore before the tipstaff's man could secure the bow of the boat; and seeing his companion caught beyond the power of extrication, he snatched up the other oar, and pulled away, down the river, as hard as he could.

"And now, what the devil do you want with me?" cried the man, sturdily, turning to the officer. "Come, off with your hands! Don't be fingering my collar so hard, or I'll crack your nutshell for you." And at the same time he struggled to shake off the other's grasp; but the officer, who seemed accustomed to deal with persons that did not particularly relish his ministry, very soon settled the question with his prisoner, by striking him a blow over the head, with a staff he carried, in such sort as to level him with the ground. It is wonderful how soothing to the prisoner's feelings this mild treatment seemed to be, for without any farther effort, he suffered himself to be led away to the ale-house, from whence he was safely removed the next morning to Westminster, the original owner of the boat being carried along with him as a witness. And here, let me beg all constables, Bow-street officers, scarlet-runners, street-keepers, constables of the night, and watchmen, who may read this excellent and instructive history, to take example by the prudence of the officer, who, having acquired all the information he could from other sources, wisely abstained from asking his prisoner any questions whatsoever, leaving his examination to be taken by competent persons.

Carrying his game directly to York House, the worthy and exemplary tipstaff, whose name I should not fail record, had not Vonderbrugius unfeelingly omitted it—this prince of tipstaves, I say, placed his charge in a place of security, and on the Cardinal's return from Westminster Hall, informed him of all that he had done to fulfil the mission with which he had honoured him. The Cardinal praised the tipstaff's zeal, and beginning to suspect that there was some mystery in the business, more than the mere course which Constance had taken, he ordered the prisoner, and the evidence, to be brought instantly before him; and proceeded himself to investigate the matter, and to see whether his fingers would be neat enough to pick the needle out of the bottle of hay:—a delicate operation, for which there is but one method, which may be called the Alexandrine; namely, burn the hay, and you are sure to get the needle.

Something similar was the proceeding which the Cardinal proposed to adopt; for no sooner was the prisoner brought before him, rather pale with fright, and somewhat nervous with his night's entertainment, than he pronounced a most eloquent oration upon the necessity of meeting death with firmness, warning the unhappy man, at the same time, that he had nothing to hope in this world, and bidding him to prepare for the next. Through the whole, however, he suffered to appear, implied, though not expressed, the possibility, that a free confession of all the culprit knew, concerning Lady Constance de Grey, and her evasion, might take the sting out of his offence, and disencumber his windpipe of the pressing familiarity with which it was threatened by an hempen cord.

In those times, rights were but little defined, and the extent of the great civil and political powers hardly ascertained even to the minds of the cultivated and reflecting, much less to people in the rank of the person who now stood before the prelate, surrounded by all those impressive insignia which then, indeed, implied vast, though borrowed power. Without going into the metaphysics of the business, it will be sufficient for my purpose to say, that the poor fellow was desperately frightened, especially as he had upon his conscience more than one hearty crime, which he well knew might at any time prove a sufficient excuse for sending him part of the way to Heaven, whether he ever made the whole journey out or not. Therefore, having no great interest in concealing any thing he knew, and every interest in the world in telling it, he fell down upon his knees, declaring that he would reveal all, if the Cardinal would make a solemn promise that he should have the King's free pardon, and the Church's, for every sin, crime, and misdemeanor, he had committed up to that day.

It cost him nothing but a bit of parchment, and a little yellow wax, and so the Cardinal promised; whereupon the culprit, still upon his knees, began as follows:—

“ My master, Sir Payan Wileton—”

“ Sir Payan Wileton is your master, then?” cried Wolsey.—“ So, so! Go on.”

“ My master, Sir Payan Wileton, my gracious lord,” continued the man, “ after he had been with your grace yesterday morning, returned home full speed to his house by the water's edge, near Tothill, and suddenly dispatched one of our yeomen down to Richmond with a poor foolish priest, saving your Grace's presence, who had been with him some days. After that, he wrote a note, and giving it to me, bade me take with me Black John, and gallop down to the court like mad. Whenever we got there, I was to speak with Hatchel Sivard, whom he had set to spy all that passed at the palace, and who would help me to hire a boat for the day. After that was done, I was to seek the Lady de Grey, and give her the note; and then, leaving our horses at the baiting-house, I and my fellow were to wait in the boat till the lady came, and to row her whithersoever she directed; but, above all, to seem like common watermen, and to take whatever payment she gave us. And if by chance she didn't come, we were to give up the boat, and return."

As may be supposed, Wolsey was not a little surprised at the intrigue which this opened to his view. "So!" said he. "So! Hatchel Sivard, the Page of the Queen's antechamber, is a pensioned spy of Sir Payan Wileton.—Good! Very good!—Of course you carried the lady to her relation's house, ha?"

"Not so, may it please your Lordship's Grace," replied the man. "At first, she made as if she would have stopped at Tothill, but then she bade us row on to Westminster, where she landed."

“ But you saw where she went,” cried Wolsey, his brow darkening. “ Mind, your life depends upon your speaking truth! Let me but see a shade of falsehood, and you are lost !”

“ As I hope for mercy, my Lord, I tell you the whole truth,” replied the servant. “ When she was landed, I got out and followed; but, after turning through several streets, I saw that they marked me watching, so I was obliged to run down a narrow lane, hoping to catch them by going round; but they had taken some other way, and I found them not again.”

Wolsey let his hand drop heavily upon the table, disappointed in his expectations.—“ You say them, fellow! Who do you mean?” he demanded. “ Who was with her?”

“ Her waiting-woman, your Grace,” answered the man, “ and an old priest, whom Sivard says is her chaplain.”

“ Ah !” said Wolsey thoughtfully, “ Dr. Wilbraham! This is very strange! A staid good man—obedient to my will—coinciding in the expediency of the marriage I proposed. There must be some deeper plot here of this Sir Payan Wileton. The poor girl must ‘be deceived, and perhaps not so much obstinate as misled.—I see it—I see it all.—The wily traitor seeks her estates, and would fain both stop her marriage and bring her within my displeasure.—A politic scheme, upon my honour; but it shall not succeed.—Secretary, bid an usher speed to Sir Payan Wileton, and, greeting him sweetly, request his presence for a moment here.”

It was the latter part of the above speech only that met the ear of those around, the rest being muttered to himself in a low and almost inaudible tone. “Pray, pray, your Lordship’s Grace!” cried the man, clasping his hands in terror as soon as he heard Wolsey’s command. “Do not let Sir Payan have me. I shall not be alive this time two days, if you do. Indeed I shan’t. Your Grace does not know him. There is nothing stops him in his will; and I shall be found dead in my bed, or drowned in a pond, or tumbled out of window, or something like; and then Sir Payan will pretend to make an investigation, and have the crowner, and it will be found all accident. If it is the same to your Lordship’s Grace, I would rather be hanged at once, and know what I'm about, than be given up to Sir Payan, to die no one can tell how."

"Fear not, fool," said Wolsey; "but tell the whole truth, and you shall be safe; ay, and rewarded. Conceal any thing, and you shall be hanged. Take him away, Secretary, and examine him carefully. Make him give an exact account of every thing he has seen in the house of Sir Payan Wileton, and after putting it in writing, swear him to it; and then—hark you," and he whispered something to the Secretary, adding, "Let him be there well used."

The man was now removed from the Cardinal's presence; and waiting till the messenger returned from Sir Payan's, Wolsey remained in deep thought, revolving in his keen and scrutinizing mind all the parts of the shrewd plot he had just heard developed, and thinking over the best means of punishing Sir Payan Wileton, in such a manner as to make his fall most bitter. While thus engaged, one of his secretaries entered, and bowing low stood silent, as if waiting for permission to speak.

“What is it?” said Wolsey; “Is it matter of consequence?”

The secretary bowed low again, and replied, “It is the herald’s opinion, my Lord, upon the succession of the old Lord Orham of Barne-ton, the miser, who left the two chests of gold, as well—”

“I know, I know,” said Wolsey. “How do they give it? I trust not to that base churl, William Orham, who struck my officer one day.”

“Oh no! your Grace,” replied the secretary, “there are two nearer than he is. But they say the succession is quite clear. Charles Lord Orham, the great-grandfather of the last, had three sons, from one of which descends William Orham; but the eldest son succeeding, had two sons and a daughter, all of whom married, and had issue; the eldest son, Thomas Lord Orham, him succeeded, who had only issue the last lord. The daughter had five sons, and the second son, Hugh Orham, had one only daughter, who married Arthur Bulmer, Earl of Will-mington, who died, leaving issue one only daughter, Mistress Katrine Bulmer, by cour-tesy the Lady Katrine Bulmer, whom your Grace may remember the Queen took very young, when it was found that Lord Willmington's estates went in male descent. She is the undoubted heiress."

"Ha!" said Wolsey, "that changes much. Well, well! go see that it be clearly made out.—Now, what says Sir Payan Wileton?" he continued, turning to the messenger who had just returned.

"The house is empty, so please your Grace," replied the usher, "all but one old porter, who says that Sir Payan and his train set out for Chilham yesterday morning, after visiting your reverend Lordship. He affirms, moreover, that the Knight never got off his horse, but only gave orders that the priest should be sent down to Richmond with all speed, and then rode away himself for Kent."

"So!" said the Cardinal, his lip curling into a scornful sneer, "he finds his miscreant is caught, and thinks to deceive me with a tale that would not cloud the eyesight of an old woman. But let him stay; he shall lull himself into a fool's paradise, and then find himself fallen to nothing.—That will do." The usher fell back, and for a moment Wolsey, as was often his wont, continued muttering to himself —“ The Lady Katrine—She was Darby’s fool passion.—If it lasts he shall have her—’Tis better than the other—Besides, the other girl is away, and he must have gold to bear out his charges at this meeting at Ardres—So shall it be—Well, well—Send in whoever waits without,” he added, speaking in a louder voice, and then applied himself to other business.

CHAPTER IV.

“ Three sides are sure inbarred with craggs and hills,
The rest is easy, scarce to rise espy'd,
But mighty bulwarks fence the plainer part,
So art helps nature, nature strengtheneth art.”

FAIRFAX.

“ Sir Knight, if Knight thou be,
Abandon this forestalled place as erst,
For fear of farther harm.”

FAIRY QUEEN

It may well be supposed, that under the circumstances in which we left Sir Osborne, in the last volume, his feelings could not be of the most tranquil or gratifying nature, when, after having heard all that passed upon deck, he distinguished the steps of the officer sent to arrest him, coming down the ladder. Longpole, for his part, looked very much as if he would have liked to display cold iron upon the occasion ; but the Knight made him a sign to forbear, and in a moment after, a gentleman splendidly dressed, as one high in military command, entered the cabin, followed by two or three armed attendants.

“ Well, Sir,” said the Knight, not very well distinguishing the stranger’s features by the light in which he stood, “ I suppose—” But he had not time to finish his sentence, for the officer grasped him heartily by the hand, exclaiming, “ Now heaven bless us ! Lord Darnley, my dear fellow in arms ! how goes it with you these two years ?”

“ Excellent well, good Sir Henry Talbot,” replied the Knight, frankly shaking the hand of his old companion. “ But say, does your business lie with me ?”

“ No, no ! good faith !” replied Sir Henry, “ I came upon a very different errand. Since I was with Sir Thomas Peechy and yourself in Flanders, by my good Lord Surry’s favour, I have obtained the command of one of the King’s great ships, and as I lay last night off the mouth of the river, a pursuivant came down from London, with orders to stop every vessel that I saw, and search for a traitor who is endeavouring to make his escape to the Continent."

The Knight's cheek burned, and for a moment he hesitated whether to avow himself at once, and repel the opprobrious epithet thus attached to the name he had assumed, and under which, he felt full sure, he had never merited aught but honour. A moment's thought, however, showed him the madness of such a proceeding, and he replied, "I believe you will find no greater traitor here, Sir Henry, than myself."

The officer smiled. "If that be the case," replied he, "I may as well row back to the ship. Perhaps he may be in the other vessel that lies to there, about a mile to windward. But come, Darnley, leave this filthy Dutch tub, come with me aboard, and after we have searched the other, I will land you in any port to which you are going, if it be between Middlebourg and Boulogne."

Although the Knight did not feel himself bound, even by the most chivalrous principles of honour, to betray his own secret to Sir Henry Talbot, yet he did not consider himself at liberty to take advantage of his offer, and thus make one of the King's own ships the means of conveying him away from pursuit. He therefore replied, that as he was going to Dunkirk in some haste, and the Dutchman was steering thither straight, he thought it would be best to proceed without changing his ship, though he felt extremely obliged by the offer.

The officer received his excuses in good part, and bidding him farewell, with many hearty wishes for his future prosperity, he mounted again to the deck, called his men together, abused the Dutchman vigorously for a few minutes, and getting into the boat, rowed away for his own vessel.

It is hardly necessary here to inform the reader, that the distinction which at present exists between the naval and military services, has not been known above an hundred and fifty years; and that, consequently, Sir Henry Talbot's having distinguished himself on land, so far from being a disqualification, was one of the highest recommendations to him in the sea-service ! Vonderbrugius takes no notice of the circumstance, as probably the same practice existed in his time, although the latest instance that I can call to mind, is that of General Monk, who after having lived on land all his life, grew amphibious at the age of fifty.

However that may be, deceiving himself—as we have seen, Sir Henry Talbot left the young Knight to meditate over the conduct of Wolsey, who would indeed have committed an egregious piece of folly in sending to arrest him by the name of Sir Osborne Maurice alone, if he had known him to be Lord Darnley, as Sir Osborne thought. Attributing it, however, to one of those accidental omissions, which often disconcert the best-arranged proceedings, the Knight was congratulating himself on his good fortune, when Master Skippenhausen descended to offer his felicitations also, exclaiming, “ My Cot ! where did you hide yourself ? Under that pile of hammocks, I ’ll warrant.”

“ No, you man of salt herrings ! No, you cousin german to a tub of butter ! ” exclaimed Longpole, whose indignation at the captain for having by his delay of the night before, put them in such jeopardy, now broke forth irresistibly. "No, you dyke-begotten son of a swamp and a canal! If it had not been for you, we should never have run any risk, and don't flatter yourself that either you or your dirty hammocks either, had any hand in saving us."

"How did I make you run any risk, pray?" exclaimed the master. "You would have made me and my ship run a risk if you had been found in it; but I made you run none."

"Stockfish, you lie!" cried the Custrel. "Did you not lie in the mouth of the river all last night, when, if the blood in your veins had been any thing but muddy Dutch puddle, of the heaviest quality, you would have had us over to Dunkirk by this time. Deny it if you dare, Dutchman, and I will prove it upon your body, till I leave you no more shape than one of your own cheeses."

The Dutchman bore the insolence of Longpole with all that calm magnanimity for which his nation is famed (says Vonderbrugius). However, Sir Osborne desired his attendant to be silent, and merely begging Master Skippenhau-sen to carry them to their destination as soon as possible, the matter ended.

It was night before they arrived at Dunkirk, and, without troubling the reader with all the details of their disembarkation, we shall merely beg him to look into the little hall of the Flemish inn, and see the Knight and Longpole seated at the same table, according to the custom of the day which we have before alluded to, while the host, standing behind the chair of Sir Osborne, answers the various questions which from time to time are addressed to him; and that black-eyed, smooth-faced, dingy serving-boy, who one might swear was a truly begotten son of Hans Holbein, filches away the half-finished tankard of raspis from Longpole's elbow, and supplies its place with an empty one.

“And is Sir Albert of Koëningstein gone to Ratisbon too?” demanded Sir Osborne, pursuing the inquiries, which he was engaged in making concerning his old comrades, amongst whom a sad dispersion had taken place during his absence.

“Indeed I cannot tell, Sir Knight,” replied the landlord; but very likely he is with the Count of Shoenvelt, at Cassel."

"What does Shoenvelt at Cassel?" asked the Knight thoughtfully.

"He is collecting adventurers, they say, Sir, under a commission from the Emperor," replied the host. "Some think, to go against the Moors, but most people judge, to protect the frontier against Robert de la Mark."

"But Koenigstien would not serve under him," said Sir Osborne, meditating over what he heard. "He is a better captain a thousand times, and a nobler spirit."

"Well, Sir," answered the landlord, "I tell you only what I heard. Somebody told me so, I am sure. Perhaps they command together.—Boy, give his worship another tankard; don't you see that is out?"

"Odds fish!" cried Longpole, "what, all gone? Your measures, mine host, are not like that certain knight's purse, that was no sooner empty than full again. It seems to me they are no sooner full than empty."

"At Cassel, did you say he is?" demanded Sir Osborne.

“Not exactly at Cassel, Sir Knight,” replied the host, glad to pass away from the subject of the tankard; “but you know Mount St. Hubert, about a league from Cassel. Your worship will find him there.”

Sir Osborne made no reply; and, after a while, the host and his legion cleared the table of its encumbrances, and left the Knight and his follower to pursue their own thoughts undisturbed. We can hardly wonder that, though now free from all danger of pursuit, the heart of the young Knight was sad, and that his brow was clouded with many melancholy imaginings. It may be said, indeed, that he was not now in a worse situation than when he was formerly in Flanders, when he was happy and cheerful; but he was worse, inasmuch as he had since entertained hopes and expectations which were now broken and past away,—inasmuch as he had known scenes, and tasted joys, that he had now lost, and which might never be his again. Every enjoyment of the human heart is like a tree planted deeply in the soil, which when rooted out, leaves not the earth as it was before, but tears it up and scatters it abroad, and makes a yearning void difficult to be filled again.

However, there was one thing which he had gained, an object in life. Formerly his natural disposition, the chivalrous spirit of the age, the ardour of high health, and the strong impulsive bias given by early associations, had impelled him onward, on the only path of renown then open to a daring spirit. But now he had a still more inspiring motive, a more individual incitement, to press forward to the goal of fame. Constance de Grey was ever present to his thoughts, furnished the spring of all his actions, and directed his every endeavour. Renown in arms was his already; but fortune, station, he felt he must gain at the sword's point, and he only sought a good cause wherein to draw it.

The report that Albert of Koenigstien, his old friend and companion in arms, had joined the adventurers which the Count of Shoenvelt was collecting at Cassel, led him to imagine, that the cause in which they would be engaged was one that he could himself embrace with honour; although Shoenvelt's name had not been hitherto very famous for the better qualities of chivalry. He doubted not, also, that from the high station which he himself had filled in the armies of Burgundy, he should easily obtain that rank and command which he was entitled to expect, amongst the troops thus assembled.

The history of the various bands of adventurers of that day offers us some of the most curious and interesting particulars of a curious and interesting age. These companies, totally distinct from the regular armies of the time, (if regular armies they might be called,) were generally levied by some enterprising feudal lord; and commencing, most frequently, amongst his own vassals, afterwards swelled out into very formidable bodies by a junction with other bands, and by the continual accession of brave and veteran soldiers, cast upon the world by the sovereigns they had served, when peace rendered their swords no longer necessary. Of course, the numbers in these companies varied very much according to circumstances, as well as their regulations and deportment. Sometimes they consisted of thousands, sometimes of simple tens. Sometimes, with the strictest discipline and the most unshrinking valour, they entered into the service of kings, and decided the fate of empires: sometimes they were little better than roving bands of robbers, that lived by rapine, and hardly acknowledged law. Most frequently, however, in the age of which we treat, they volunteered their support to the armies of their own sovereign, or his allies, and often proved more active than the body they came to aid.

However, if Theseus had played at pitch and toss with Ariadne's clue, he would never have slain the Minotaur, and therefore we must go on with the thread of our own story, notwithstanding a strong inclination to go wool-gathering after the adventurers. Nevertheless, thus much we will say. If our readers wish a treat—let them read the delightful old Memoires of Fleuranges, "L'Aventurier," as he calls himself, which for simplicity, and, if I may use the term, bonhomie of style, for curious incident and romantic adventure, is far superior to any romance that ever was written. Many curious particulars also, concerning the appearance and conduct of the adventurers, may be found in the letters of Clement Morat to Marguerite de Valois.

But to proceed :—the next morning, by day-break, Sir Osborne and his companion were once more on horseback, and on their way to Mount Cassel; the Knight having determined to learn, in the first place, the views of Shoenvelt, and to examine the real state of his troops, before he offered himself as a companion in the adventure. In case he found their object such as he could not himself seek, his mind was hardly made up, whether to offer his services to the Emperor, or to Francis, King of France. His old habits, indeed, tended to make him prefer the Imperial army; but from all he had heard of the new Chief of the German confederacy, there was a sort of cold-blooded, calculating policy in his every action, that little accorded with the warm and chivalrous feelings of the young Knight: while, at the same time, there was in the whole conduct of Francis, a noble, candid, generosity of heart, a wild enthusiastic spirit of daring and adventure, that wonderfully attracted Sir Osborne towards him.

Journeying on with a quick pace, Mount

Cassel soon rose to the traveller's sight, starting out of the vast plains in which it stands, like some high spirit towering above the flat multitude.

Sweeping round its base, the Knight turned his horse towards a lesser hill, at about two miles distance, the top of which was, in that day, crowned by the Castle of Shoenvelt. From the plain below, as the eye wandered up the side of the mountain, amidst the wood and broom that covered the rock in large masses, might be seen peeping forth, wall, and bastion, and outwork, while higher up, in zig-zag lines upon the clear back-ground of the sky, appeared the towers and battlements of the castle, with the tall donjon rising above them all, and the banner of Shoenvelt, bearing sable a saltier gules, floating in the sunshine.

A broad, fair road offered itself for the travellers' horses, winding along a narrow rocky ridge, which was the only part, that slowly descending, joined the hill gradually to the plain. All the rest was steep and precipitous, and too well guarded by nature to be liable to attack; while overhanging this sole approach, might be seen, on every side, many a frowning defence, well prepared against any hostile footstep. Gradually as the road wound upwards, it grew narrower and more narrow, confined between two high banks, commanded by the towers of the castle, while the road itself was completely raked by the guns of the barbican.

Sir Osborne remarked it all with a soldier's eye, looking on it as a mechanist does on some fine piece of art, and observing the purpose of every different part. Pressing on, however, he soon arrived at the gate, and demanded if Sir Albert of Koenigstien was in the castle.

Though in time of peace, no gate was opened, and the sole response of the soldier to whom he spoke, was, "Who are you?" uttered through the grille of the barbican. The Knight gave his name, and the man retired without making any farther answer.

"This looks like precaution, Longpole," said the Knight. "Methinks they would run no great danger in letting two men pass the gate, though they may be armed at all points."

"I suppose the custom of this castle, is like the custom of a rat-hole," replied Longpole, "to let but one in at a time. But I hope you won't stay here, my lord. I have an invincible hatred at being built up. As much of the camp and fair field as you like, but Lord deliver me from stone and mortar. Besides, this place smacks marvellously of a den of free companions. Look at that fellow with the pike on his shoulder; neither his morion nor his corslet, have known sand and the rubbing-stick since his great ancestor was drowned with Pharaoh; and 'twas then his harness got so rusty, depend on it."

"In a Red Sea, I am afraid," said Sir Osborne. "But here comes the janitor."

As he spoke, the guardian of the gate approached, with a bunch of keys, and soon gave the Knight the means of entrance. Sir Osborne, however, still held his bridle in, and demanded once more, if Sir Albert of Koenigstien was in the castle.

"I cannot tell you, Sir," replied the soldier. "I know not the title of all the knights here. All I can say is, that I gave your name and errand to my lord, who sits at table in the great hall, and that he greets you heartily, and invites you in."

At this moment a group of gentlemen appeared, coming through the gate of the inner ballium, and Sir Osborne, not doubting that they had been sent by the Count to conduct him to the hall, saw that he could not now avoid entering, whether the officer he sought was there or not. Riding through the gate, then, he dismounted, and giving his horse to Longpole, met the party he had seen advancing, the principal of whom, with much reverence and courtesy, prayed the Sire de Darnley, on the part of Count Shoenvelt, to enter and quaff a cup of wine with him. Sir Osborne expressed his willingness to do so, in the same strain, and then repeated his inquiry for his friend.

"We are unhappy in not having his company," replied the gentleman; "but I believe the Count expects him here in a few days."

He was a young man who spoke, and there was a sort of flush came over his cheek, as he announced the probable coming of Koenigstien, which induced Sir Osborne to imagine that his report was not very correct; and fixing his eye upon him, he merely said, "Does he?" with a slight degree of emphasis.

"Yes, Sir, he does!" cried the youth, colouring still more highly. "Do you mean to say he does not?"

"Not in the least," said Sir Osborne; "as you may see by my seeking him here; and I am sure, that so gallant a squire as yourself, would never swerve from truth.

The young man bent down his eyes, and began playing with his sword-knot, while Sir Osborne now perfectly convinced that the whole tale was a falsehood, followed on in silence, prepared to act according to this opinion. In a few minutes they passed through the portal of the keep, and entered at once into the great hall, up the midst of which was placed a long table, surrounded by the chief of Shoenvelt's adventurers, with various pages and varlets, serving the meats and pouring out the wine. Round upon the walls hung the arms of the various guests, cumbering every hook or peg that could be found; and where these had been scanty, they were cast upon the ground behind the owner's seats, together with saddles and bards, and other horse caparisons ; while in the corner leaned several score of lances, mingled amongst which were one or two knightly pennons, and many a sheaf of arrows, jostled by the upstart weapons, destined in the end to banish them from the stage, such as hackbuts, hand-guns, and other new invented fire-arms.

At the farther end of the table, digging deeply with his dagger in a chine of wild boar pork, which had been just placed before him, sat the Count of Shoenvelt himself, tall, strong-limbed, and grisly, with a long, drooping, hooked nose, depressed at the point, as if some one had set their thumb on it, at the same time squeezing it down, and rather twisting it on one side. This implement was flanked, if one may use the term, by a pair of small keen hawk's eyes, which expressed more active cunning than vigorous thought ; while a couple of immense ears, sticking out on each side of his head, and worn into various irregular calosities by the pressure of his helmet, gave a singular and brute-like appearance to his whole visage, not easy to be described. He was dressed in a hacqueton, or close jacket of buff leather, laced with gold, on which might be seen, especially towards the arms, sundry daubs and stains, to the number of which he had just added another, by dashing all the gravy over his sleeve, in his furious hacking of the large and stubborn piece of meat before him. This accident had called into his face not the most angelic expression, and as he sat he would have made a good picture of an inferior sort of devil; the whole effect being heightened by a strong ray of light passing through a purple pane of the stained-glass window, and falling with a ghastly lustre upon his dark ferocious countenance.

The moment, however, that he perceived Sir Osborne, his brow was smoothed, and rising from his seat, he advanced towards him with great expressions of joy. "My dear Lord of Darnley," cried he, taking him in his arms and pressing him to his bosom with a hug, that the Knight would willingly have dispensed with; "welcome! a thousand times welcome to St. Hubert's Castle! Whether you come to stay with us as a companion, or whether you are but a passing guest, your visit is an honour and a delight to all within these walls. Knights and gentlemen," continued he, "pledge me all a cup to the health of the Sire de Darnley."

To the party by whom he was surrounded, such a proposal was what nobody felt at all inclined to reject, and consequently there was instantly a vast rattling of cups and tankards, and no one complained that their bowl was too full. All pledged Lord Darnley; and he could not refuse to do them justice in a cup of wine. After which, taking the seat that Shoenvelt assigned him by his side, the Knight gazed over the various grim and war-worn faces which were gathered round the table, some of which he knew merely by sight, and some, who having exchanged a word or two with him in the various reciprocations of military service, now looked as if they claimed some mark of recognition. Sir Osborne was not the man to reject such appeal, and he gave the expected bow to each, though amongst them all, he saw no one who had greatly distinguished himself for those high feelings and generous virtues that ever marked the true Knight.

Many were the questions that were asked him; many the conjectures that were propounded to him for confirmation, respecting the designs of France and England, and of Germany; and it was some time before he could cut them short, by informing his interrogators that he had been for the last three months, in his own country, so deeply occupied by his private affairs, that he had given no attention to the passing politics of the day. The whole party seemed greatly disappointed, entertaining apparently a much more violent thirst for news than even that which is commonly to be met with in all small communities, cut off from general information, and unoccupied by greater or better subjects of contemplation.

As soon as the meal, which was drawing towards its end when Sir Osborne entered, was completely concluded, Shoenvelt rose, and begged to entertain him for a few minutes in private, which being agreed to, he led him forth into a small space enclosed with walls, wherein the provident Chatelain had contrived to assemble against the hour of need, a very sufficient store of cabbages, turnips, carrots, and other canaille of the vegetable kingdom, which might be very serviceable in case of siege. Here, walking up and down a long path that bordered the beds, with Sir Osborne on his right, and a knight named Wilsten (whom he had invited to the conference) on his left, Shoenvelt addressed Lord Darnley somewhat to the following effect, generally while he did so fixing his eyes upon vacancy, as a man does who recites awkwardly a set speech, but still from time to time giving a quick sharp glance towards the Knight's countenance, to see the impression he produced.

“ Valiant and worthy Knight,—a-hem ! a-hem !” said Shoenvelt. “ Every one, whether in Germany or France, England or Spain, or even here in our poor Duchy of Burgundy,—a-hem ! a-hem !—Every one, I say, has heard of your valorous feats and courageous deeds of arms ; wherefore it cannot be matter of astonishment to you, that wherever there is a captain, who having gathered together a few hardy troops—a-hem ! a-hem !—is desirous of signaling himself in the service of his country—a-hem !—wherever there is such a one, I say, you cannot be surprised that he wishes to gain you to his aid.”—Here Shoenvelt gave a glance to Wilsten to see if he approved his proemium; after which he again proceeded.—“Now you must know, worthy Knight, that I have here in my poor castle, which is a strong one, as you may perceive,—a-hem,—no less than five hundred as good spearmen as ever crossed a horse, which I have gathered together for no mean purpose.—A purpose,” he continued, mysteriously, “which, if effected, will not only enrich all persons who contribute their aid thereto, but will gain them the eternal thanks of our good and noble Emperor,—a-hem ! a-hem !—I could say more—a-hem !”

“Tonder, man! tell him all,” cried Wilsten, who had served with Sir Osborne, and had the reputation of being a brave and gallant knight, though somewhat addicted to plunder; “or let me tell him, for your bedevilled hems take more time than it would to storm a fort.—This is the case, Sir Knight. A great meeting is to take place between the King of France and the King of England at the border, and all the nobility of France are in motion through Picardy, and the frontier provinces, covered with more gold than they ever had in their lives before. Even Francis himself, like a mad fool, is running from castle to castle, along the frontier, sometimes with not more than half a dozen followers.—Now, then, fancy what a rich picking may be had amidst these gay French gallants; and if Francis himself were to fall into our hands, we might command half a kingdom for his ransom—Ah?”

“But I thought that the two countries were at peace,” said the Knight, with a coldness of manner sufficiently marked, as he thought, to prevent any farther communication of the kind.

Wilsten, however, was not to be stopped, and replied, “Ay, a sort of peace—A peace that is no peace on the frontiers. Don’t let that frighten you—We can prove that they were the first aggressors! Why, did not they, less than ten days ago, attack the garrison of St. Omer’s, and kill three men in trying to force the gate? Have they not ravaged half Hainault? But, however, as I said, be not startled at that; Shoenvelt saw the Emperor about two months ago, who gave him to understand that we could not do him a better service than either to take Francis alive, or give him a stroke with a lance. And fear not that our plans are well laid; we have already two hundred men scattered over the frontier; every forest, every village, has its ten or twelve, ready to join at a moment's notice, when we sound to the standard: two hundred more follow to-night, and Shoenvelt and I to-morrow, in small parties, so as not to be suspected. Already we have taken a rich burgher of Beauvais, with velvets and cloths of gold, worth a hundred thousand florins. But that is nothing; the King is our great object, and him we shall have, without some cursed accident prevents it: for we do not hunt him by report only, we have our gaze-hound upon him, who never loses sight. What think you of that, Sir Knight? Count William of Firstenberg, Shoenvelt's cousin, who is constantly with Francis, ay, and well beloved of him, is our sworn companion, and gives us notice of all his doings. What think you of that, Sir Knight—Ha?"

"I think him a most infernal villain!" cried Sir Osborne, his indignation breaking forth in spite of his better judgment. "By heaven before I would colleague with such a traitor, I'd have my hand struck off."

"Ha!" cried Shoenvelt, who had marked the Knight's coldness all along, and now burst into fury. "A traitor! Sir Knight, you lie—Ho! shut the gates there. By heaven, he will betray us, Wilsten! call Marquard's guard—down with him to a dungeon;" and laying his hand upon his sword, he prepared to stop the Knight, who now strode rapidly towards the gate.

"Nay, nay," cried Wilsten, holding his companion's arm. "Remember, Shoenvelt, 'tis your own hold. He must not be hurt here—nay, by my faith he shall not;—we will find a more fitting place—hold, I say."

While Shoenvelt, still furious, strove to free himself from Wilsten, Sir Osborne passed the gate of the garden, and entered the space of the outer ballium, where Longpole had pertinaciously remained with the two horses, as close to the barbican, whose gate had been left open when they entered, as possible, seeming to have had a sort of presentiment that it might be necessary to secure possession of the bridge.

The moment the Knight appeared without any conductors, the shrewd Custrel conceived at once that something had gone wrong, sprang upon his own horse, gave a glance round the court to see that his retreat could not be cut off, and perceiving that almost all the soldiers were near the inner wall, he led forward his Lord's charger to meet him.

Sir Osborne had his foot in the stirrup, when Shoenvelt, now broken away from Wilsten, rushed forth from the garden, vociferating to his men to shut the gate, and to raise the draw-bridge, but in a moment the Knight was in the saddle; and spurring on, with one buffet of his hand in passing, he felled a soldier, who had started forward to drop the cullis, and darted over the bridge.

“On to the other gate, Longpole,” cried he. “Quick. Make sure of it;” and turning his own horse, he faced Shoenvelt, who now seeing him gone beyond his power, stood foaming under the arch.—“Count of Shoenvelt!” cried he, drawing off his glove, “thou art a liar, a traitor, and a villain, which, when you will, I will prove upon your body. There lies my gage;”

and casting down his gauntlet, he galloped after Longpole, who stood with his sword drawn in a small outer gate, which had been thrown forward even beyond the barbican.

“Up, archers up,” cried Shoenvelt, storming with passion; “up, lazy villains—a hundred crowns to him who sends me an arrow through his heart. Draw! draw, slaves! Draw! I say.”

In a moment an arrow stuck in Sir Osborne’s surcoat, and another lighted on his casque, but, luckily, as we have seen, the more easily to carry his harness, or armour, he rode completely armed, and the missiles from the castle fell in vain.

However, lest his horse should suffer, which not being sufficiently covered by its bard to insure it from a chance arrow, might have been disabled at the very moment he needed it most, the Knight spurred on as fast as possible, and having joined Longpole, descended the narrow way by which they had mounted.

Still for some way the arrows continued to fall about them, though with less assured aim and exhausted force; so that the only danger that remained, might be apprehended, either from the guns of the castle being fired upon them, or from Shoenvelt sending out a body of spearmen in their pursuit. Neither of these, however, took place; the inhabitants of the country round, and the commander of Cassel being too jealous and suspicious of Shoenvelt already, for him to do any thing which might more particularly attract their attention; and to this cause, and this cause only, was Sir Osborne indebted for his unpursued escape.

CHAPTER V.

How blest am I by such a man led,
Under whose wise and careful guardship
I now despise fatigue and hardship.

AS soon as they were out of reach of immediate annoyance, the Knight reined in his horse, and turned to see if Shoenvelt showed any symptoms of an inclination to follow. But all was now quiet: the gates shut, the drawbridge raised, and not even an archer to be seen upon the walls. Sir Osborne's eye, however, ran over tower, and bartizan, and wall, and battlement, with so keen and searching a glance, that if any watched him in his progress, it must have been from the darkest loophole in the castle, to escape the notice of his marking eye.

Satisfied at length with his scrutiny, he again pursued his journey down the steep descent into the vast plain of Flanders, and turned his horse towards Mount Cassel, giving Longpole an account, as he went, of the honourable plans and purposes of the good Count of Shoenvelt.

“Odd’s life, my Lord,” said Longpole, “let us go into that part of the world too. If we could but get a good stout fellow or two to our back, we might disconcert them.”

“I fear they are two many for us,” replied the Knight, “though it seems that Shoenvelt, avaricious of all he can get, and afraid that aught should slip through his hands, has divided his men into tens and twelves, so that a few spears well led, might do a great deal of harm amongst them. At all events Longpole, we will buy a couple of lances at Cassel, for we may yet chance to meet with some of Shoenvelt’s followers on our road.”

Conversing over their future proceedings, they now mounted the steep ascent of Mount Cassel, and approached the gate of the town, the iron grate of which, to their surprise, was slowly pushed back in their faces as they rode up. “Ho ! soldier, why do you shut the gate ?” cried

Sir Osborne, "don't you see, we are coming in?"

"No, you are not," replied the other, who was a stiff old Hainaulter, looking as rigid and untractable as the iron jack that covered his shoulders; "none of Shoenvelt's plunderers come in here."

"But we are neither friends, nor plunderers of Shoenvelt's," said the Knight; "we are his enemies, and have just made our escape from St. Hubert's."

"Ah! a fine tale! a fine tale!" replied the soldier, through the barred gate, which he continued slowly and imperturbably to fasten against them. "We saw you come down the hill, but you don't step in here to-night—so you had better ride away, before the captain sends down to make you. We all know that you can lie as well as rob."

"By my life if I were in, I'd split your morion for you," said the Knight, enraged at the cool nonchalance of the Hainaulter.

"Doubtless," replied he, in the same sort of indifferent snuffling tone, "doubtless—you look like it—and that's one reason why I shall keep you out."

Sir Osborne wasted no more words on the immovable old pikeman, but angrily turning his horse, began again to descend the hill. A little way down the steep, there was even then, as now, a small hamlet serving as a sort of suburb to the town above, and towards this the Knight took his way, pausing to gaze, every now and then, on the vast interminable plain that lay stretched at his feet, spread over which, he could see a thousand cities and villages, all filled with their own little interests and feelings, wherein he had no part or sympathy, and a thousand roads leading away to them, in every direction, without any one to guide his choice, or to tell him on which he might expect prosperity or disaster.

"To Aire," said he, after he had thought for some time. "We will go to Aire; I hear that the Count de Ligny, whom I fought at Isson, is there, and the Chevalier Bayard, and many other gallant knights and gentlemen, who, perhaps, may welcome me amongst them.—Is not that the smoke of a forge, Longpole? Perhaps we may find an armourer? Let us see."

As the Knight had imagined, so it proved, and on their demanding two strong lances, the armourer soon brought them forward a bundle of stiff ash staves, bidding them choose. After some examination to ascertain the soundness of the wood, their choice was made, and the Fleming proceeded to adjust to the smaller end of each, two hands-breadths of pointed iron, which being fastened and clenched, the Knight and his follower paid the charge, and taking possession of their new weapons rode away, directing their course towards Hazebrouck, in their way to Aire.

Their progress now became necessarily slow ; for though both horses were powerful in limb and joint, and trained to carry great burdens and endure much fatigue, yet the weight of a heavy iron bard, together with that of a tall strong man armed at all points, was such that in a long journey it necessarily made itself felt. Evidently perceiving by the languor of his motions, that the charger which bore him was becoming greatly wearied, Sir Osborne ceased to urge him, and proposed to stop for the evening at the very first village that could boast of an inn. Nevertheless, it was some time before they met with such a one, most of the hamlets on the road being too poor and insignificant to require or possess any thing of the kind. At length, however, a small neat house with a verdant holy-bush over the door, invited their steps, and entering, Sir Osborne was saluted heartily by the civil host, who with brandished knife, and snowy bib, was busily engaged in cooking various savoury messes for any guest that Providence might send him. Some specimens of his handiwork were placed before the Knight and Longpole, as soon as their horses had been taken care of; and an excellent bottle of old wine, together with some fatigue, induced them to linger a little at the table.

The lattice, which was open, looked out across the road to the little village green, where was to be seen many a school-boy playing in the fine May evening, and mocking, in his childish sports, the sadder doings of the grown up children of the day. Here, horsed upon their fellows' backs, were two that acted the part of knights, tilting at each other with broomsticks; and there, marshalled in fair order by a youthful captain, marched a body of young lansquenets, advancing and retreating, wheeling and charging, with no small precision.

Sir Osborne watched them for a while, in somewhat of a moralizing mood, till his musing was disturbed by the trotting of a horse past the window, and in a moment after he heard the good-humoured voice of the host addressing the person who arrived.

“ Ah ! master Frederick,” he said, “ what back again so soon ! I told you you would soon be tired of soldiering.”

“ Nay, nay, Regnault,” answered a voice that Sir Osborne thought he had heard before ; “ I am not tired of soldiering, and never shall be, but I am tired of consorting with a horde of plunderers, for such is Shoenvelt, and such are all his followers. But while I lead my horse to the stable, get me something to eat, good Regnault, for I do not want to go back to the hall till I have dented my sword at least.

“ What are you going to it again ?” cried the host ; “ Stay at home, Master Frederick ! Stay at home ! Take care of the house your father has left you. If you are not so rich as the Baron, you have enough, and that is better than riches, if one knew it."

"My father was a soldier," answered the young man, "and distinguished himself; and so will I too, before I sit down in peace."

Here the conversation ceased, and the host entering the room in which sat the Knight and follower, began to lay out one of the small tables with which it was furnished. "That is as good a youth," said he addressing Sir Osborne, while he proceeded with his preparations:—"that is as good a youth as ever breathed, if he had not taken this fit of soldiering. His father was a younger brother of old Count Altaman, and after many years' service, came to our village, and bought a piece of ground, where he built a house—your worship may see it from here, over the side of the hill, with the wood behind it.—He has been dead now a year, and his wife near three; and so Master Frederick there must needs go soldiering. They say it is all love for the Baron's daughter. But here he comes."

As he spoke, the young man entered the room, presenting to Sir Osborne, as he had expected, the face of the youth who had been sent by Shoenvelt to welcome him on his arrival at the castle. An ingenuous blush overspread the young Hainaulter's countenance, when he saw Sir Osborne, and taking his seat at the table prepared for him, he turned away his head, and began his meal in silence.

“Had not you better take off your corslet, Master Frederick?” demanded the host.

“No, no, Regnault,” replied the youth; “I do not know that I shall stay here all night. Never mind! give me some wine, and leave me.”

Thus repulsed, the innkeeper withdrew, and Sir Osborne continued to watch the young soldier, who, whether it was a feeling of shame at meeting the Knight, and degradation at having been made, even in a degree, a party to Shoenvelt's attempt to deceive him; or whether it was bitterness of spirit at returning to his native place unsuccessful, seemed to have his heart quite full; and it appeared to be with pain that he ate the food which was placed before him.

Sir Osborne could feel for disappointed hopes, and after regarding him for a moment or two in silence, he crossed the room and laid his hand upon his shoulder.

The young man turned round, with a flushed cheek, hardly knowing whether by anger at the familiarity to vent the vexed feelings of his heart, or to take it in good part, and strive to win the esteem of a man whom he had been taught to admire.

But there was a frankness in the Knight's manner, and a noble kindness of intent in his look, that soon removed all doubt: "So, young gentleman," said he, "you have left Count Shoenvelt's company. I thought you were not made to stay long amongst them; but say, was it with his will?"

"I staid not to ask, my Lord," replied the young man; "I was bound to Shoenvelt in no way, and the moment the gates were opened after you were gone, I rode out, and came away."

Sir Osborne shook his head. "When a soldier engages with a commander," said he, "his own will and pleasure must not be the term of his service. But of all things, he ought not to quit his leader's banner, without giving notice that he intends to do so."

"But, thank God!" cried the young Hainaulter, "I had not yet taken service with Shoenvelt. He wanted to swear me to it, as he does the rest; but I would not do so, till I saw more of him and of his plans—and so I told him."

"That makes the matter very different," replied the Knight with a smile, "I am heartily glad to hear it, for I dare pronounce him a traitorous ruffian and no true knight. But one more question, young Sir, if I urge not your patience. How came you to seek Shoenvelt at first, who never bore a high renown, but as a marauder."

The youth hesitated. "It matters not, Sir Knight," replied he after a moment's pause, "to you or to any one, what reasons I might have to seek renown as speedily as possible, and why the long tedious road to knighthood and to fame, first as page, and then as squire, and then as man-at-arms, was such as I could not bear; but so it was; and as Shoenvelt gave out, that he had high commissions from the Emperor, and was to do great deeds, I hoped that with him

I might find speedy means of signalizing myself. After being two days in the castle, I discovered that his whole design was plunder, which was not the way to fame ; and this morning he made me deliver you a message, which, I knew to be a falsehood, which was not the road to honour ; so I determined to leave him ; and as the spearmen are always dropping out of the castle by five or six at a time, to go down to the frontier, I soon found the means of getting away."

"Your's is an error, my good ycuth," said Sir Osborne, "which I am afraid we are all wont to entertain in the first heat of our early days ; but we soon find that the road to fame is hard and difficult of access, and that it requires time, and perseverance, and labour, and strength, even to make a small progress therein. Even those who with a gay imagination, fancy they have made themselves wings to fly up to the top, soon, like the Cretan of old, sear their pinions in the sun, or drop into the sea of oblivion. However, are you willing to follow a poor Knight, who, though he cannot promise either fame or riches, will lead you, at least, in the path of honour ?"

The enthusiastic youth caught the Knight's hand, and kissed it in inexpressible delight. "What, follow you!" cried he, "follow the Lord Darnley! the Knight of Burgundy! whose single arm maintained the bridge at Bovines against the bravest of the Duke of Alençon's horse! Ay, that I will, follow him through the world.—Do you hear that Regnault," he cried to the innkeeper, who now entered, "Do you hear that? Instead of the base Shoenvelt, I am going to follow the noble Lord of Darnley, who was armed a Knight by the Emperor himself."

The honest innkeeper congratulated Master Frederick heartily upon the exchange; for the Knight was now in that part of the country where his name, if not his person, was well known; and in that age, the fame of gallant actions, and of noble bearing, spread rapidly through all ranks, and gained the meed of applause from men, whom we might suppose little capable of appreciating it.

All preliminaries were speedily arranged, and the next morning, Sir Osborne set out by dawn for the small town of Hazebrouck, which lay at about two leagues' distance, where he took care to furnish his new follower with a lance, and several pieces of defensive armour that were wanting to his equipment ; and then, to ascertain what reliance might be placed on his support in case of emergency, he excited him to practice various military exercises with himself, as they rode along towards Aire. To his no small surprise and pleasure, he found that the young Hainaulter, though somewhat rash and hasty, was far more skilful in the use of his weapons, and the management of his horse, than he could have conceived ; and with such an addition to his party, he no longer scrupled to cast himself in the way of some of Shoenvelt's bodies of marauders, to keep his hand in, as Longpole quaintly expressed it, when he heard his lord's determination.

“ Come, Frederick,” said the Knight, “ I will not go on to Aire, as I had determined ; but, in order to gratify your wish for renown, we will lay about on the frontier, like true errant knights of old, at any village or other place where we may find shelter ; and if we meet with Shoenvelt, or any of his, mind you do honour to your arms. We shall always have the odds of eight or nine against us."

"No, no, Sir Knight!" cried the young soldier, "do not believe that. It is one of his falsehoods; there are not above ten in any of the bands, and most of them are five or six.—I know where most of them lie."

"Hush, hush!" cried Sir Osborne, raising his finger, "you must tell me nothing, that if you should chance to break a lance with him, your hand may not tremble at thinking you have betrayed his counsel.—Nay, do not blush, Frederick. A man that aspires to chivalry must guide himself by stricter rules than other men. It was for this I spoke. Here is the fair river Lys, if I remember right?"

"It is so, Sir Knight," replied the other; "there is a bridge about a mile lower down."

"What, for a brook like this?" cried Sir Osborne, spurring his horse in. "Oh, no, we will ford it. Follow."

The young Hainalter's horse did not like the plunge, and shied away from the brink. "Spur him in, spur him in!" cried Longpole. "If our lord reaches the other bank first, he will never forgive us. He swims like an otter himself, and fancies that his squires ought to be water-rats by their birth-right."

"Down with the left rein!" cried the Knight, turning as his horse swam, and seeing the situation of his young follower. "Give him the spur, and bring him to a demivolte, and he must in."

As the Knight said, at the second movement of the demivolte, the horse's feet were brought on the very brink of the river, and a slight touch of the mullet made him plunge over; so that, though somewhat embarrassed with his lance in the water, Frederic soon reached the other bank in safety.

One of the beautiful Flemish meadows, which still in many parts skirt the banks of the Lys, presented itself on the other side; and beyond that, a forest that has long since known the rude touch of the heavy axe, which, like some fell enchanter's wand, has made so many of the loveliest woods in Europe disappear, without leaving a trace behind. The one we speak of was then in its full glory, sweeping along with a rich undulating outline by the side of the soft green plain that bordered the river, sometimes advancing close to the very brink, as if the giant trees of which it was composed sought to contemplate their grandeur in the watery mirror, sometimes falling far away, and leaving a wide open space between itself and the stream, covered with thick short grass, and strewn with the thousand flowers wherewith Nature's liberal hand has fondly decorated her favourite spring. Every here and there too, the wood itself would break away, discovering a long glade penetrating into the deepest recesses of its bosom, filled with the rich mellow forest light, that streaming between every aperture, checquered the green mossy path below, and showed a long perspective of vivid light and shade as far as the eye could reach.

It was up one of these, that Sir Osborne took his way, willing to try the mettle of his new follower, and to initiate him into the trade of war, by a few of its first hardships and dangers, doubting not, that Shoenvelt had taken advantage of that forest, situated as it was, between Lillers and Aire, to post at least one party of his men therein. From what the youth had let drop, as well as from what he had himself observed, the Knight was led to believe that the adventurer had greatly magnified the number of his forces; and he also concluded that, to avoid suspicion, he had divided his men into very small troops, except on such points as he expected the King of France himself to pass; and even then Sir Osborne did not doubt that thirty men would be the extent of any one body. Francis's habit of riding almost unattended, with the fearless confidence natural to his character, being but too well known on the frontier.

To meet with Shoenvelt himself, and, if possible, to disappoint his schemes for plunder, was now the Knight's castle in the air; and though the numbers of his own party were so scanty, he felt the sort of confident assurance in his own courage, his own strength, and his own skill, which is ever worth a host in moments of danger. Longpole, he was sure also, would be no inefficient aid; and though the young Hainaulter might not be their equal in experience or skill, Sir Osborne did not fear that, in time of need, his enthusiastic courage and desire to distinguish himself, would make him more than a match for one of Shoenvelt's company.

Under these circumstances, the Knight would never have hesitated to attack a body of double, or perhaps treble his own number; and yet he resolved to proceed cautiously; endeavouring in the first place to inform himself of the situation of Shoenvelt's various bands, and to ascertain which he was likely to join himself.

Wilsten having let drop that he himself and the Count, as the two leaders, were to set out the next morning, Sir Osborne saw that no time was to be lost, in reconnoitring the ground, to ascertain the real force of the adventurers. He resolved, therefore, to take every means to learn their strength; and if he found them more formidable in numbers than he imagined, to risk nothing with so few, but to provide for the King's safety, by giving notice to the garrison of Aire, that the monarch was menaced by danger; and then to aid them with his own hand to rid the frontier of such dangerous visitors, though he felt a great degree of reluctance to share with any one an enterprise full of honourable danger. At all events, it was necessary to ascertain where Francis was, for Shoenvelt might have been deceived, or the King might have already quitted the frontier, or he might be accompanied by sufficient escort to place his person in security; or, in short, a thousand circumstances might have happened, which would render the enterprise of the adventurers abortive, and his own interference unnecessary, if not impertinent.

Revolving all these considerations in his mind, sometimes proceeding in silence, sometimes calling upon his companions for their opinion, Sir Osborne took his way up one of the deep glades of the forest, still keeping a watchful ear to every sound that stirred in the wood, so that not a note of the thrush or the blackbird, nor the screaming of a jay, or the rustle of a rabbit, escaped him; and yet nothing met his ear which might denote that there were other beings hid beneath those green boughs besides themselves, and the savage tenants of the place, the stag, the wild boar, and the wolf.

The deep ruts, formed by some heavy wood-cart in the soft mossy carpet of the glade, told that the route they were pursuing was one which most probably communicated with some village, or some other road of greater thoroughfare; and after following it for about a mile, they perceived that, now joined to another exactly similar to itself, it wound away to the left, leaving nothing but a small bridleway before them, which Sir Osborne judged, must lead to some spot where the wood had been cleared.

As their horses were now rather fatigued, and the full sun shining upon the forest, rendered its airless paths very oppressive, the Knight chose the little path before him, hoping it would lead to some more open space, where they might repose for a while, and at the same time keep a watch upon the roads they had just quitted. His expectations were not deceitful, for after having proceeded about two hundred yards, they came to a little grassy mound, in the wood; which in former times might have monumented the field of some Gallic or Roman victory, piled up above the bones of the mighty dead. Even now, though the forest had grown round, and girt it in on every side, the trees themselves seemed to hold it in reverence, leaving it, and even some space round it, free from their grasping roots, except indeed where a group of idle hawthorns had gathered impudently on its very summit, flaunting their light blossoms to the sun, and spreading their perfume on the wind.

It was the very spot suited to Sir Osborne's purpose; and dismounting, the three travellers leaned their lances against the trees; and letting their horses pick a meal from off the forest grass, prepared to repose themselves under the shadow of the thorns. Previous to casting himself down upon the bank, however, the Knight took care to examine the wood around them, and seeing a sort of yellow light shining between the trees beyond, he pursued his way along what seemed a continuation of the little path which had brought them thither. Proceeding in a slanting direction, apparently to avoid the bolls of some enormous beeches, it did not go on for above ten or twelve yards, and then opened out upon a high road, cut through the very wildest part of the forest, at a spot where an old stone cross and fountain of clear water, commemorated the philanthropy of some one long dead, and offered the best of Nature's gifts, to the lip of the weary traveller. Sir Osborne profited by the occasion, and communicated his discovery to his companions, who took advantage of it to satisfy their thirst also. They then lay down in the shade, and, after some brief conversation, the heat of the day so overpowered the young Hainault, that he fell asleep. Such an example was never lost upon Longpole, who soon resigned himself to the drowsy god; and Sir Osborne was left the only watcher of the party.

Whether from his greater bodily powers, on which fatigue made but slight impression, or from deeper feelings, and thoughts that would not rest, sleep came not near his eyelids; and, laying at his ease in the fragrant air, a thousand busy memories came thronging through his brain, recalling love, and hope, and joy, and teaching to believe that all might yet be his.

While thus indulging waking visions, he thought he heard a distant horn, and listening, the same sound was again borne upon the wind, from some far part of the forest. It was, however, no warlike note, but evidently proceeded from the horn of some huntsman, who, as Sir Osborne concluded from the time of year, was chasing the wolf, to whom no season gives repose.

Falling back into the position from which he had risen to listen, Sir Osborne had again given himself up to thought, when he was once more roused by the sound of voices, and the tramping of horses' feet on the road hard by. Rising silently, without disturbing his companions, he glided part of the way down the path leading to the fountain, and paused amidst some oaks and shrubs, through the leaves of which he could observe what passed on the highway, without being seen himself.

Nearly opposite to the cross, already mentioned, appeared two horsemen, one of whom allowed his beast to drink, where the water, gurgling over the basin of the fountain, formed a little streamlet across the road, while the other held in his rein, about a pace behind, as if waiting, with some degree of respect, for his companion. As soon as the horse raised its head, the first cavalier turned round, and presented to Sir Osborne's view a fine and princely countenance, whose every feature, whose every glance, bespoke a generous and noble spirit.

In complexion, the stranger was of a deep tanned brown, with his eyes, his hair, and his mostacho nearly black : his brow was broad and clear, his eyes large and full, though shaded by the dark eyelashes that overhung them ; his nose was straight, and perhaps somewhat too long ; while his mouth was small, and would have been almost too delicate, had it not been for a certain marked curl of the upper lip, which gave it an expression, not of haughtiness, nor of sternness, but of grave condescending dignity. His dress was a rich hunting suit, which might well become a nobleman of the day, consisting of a green pourpoint, laced with gold, and slashed on the breast ; long white hose half covered with his boots, and a short green cloak not descending to his horse's back. His hat was of velvet, with the broad brims slightly turned up round it, and cut in various places so as somewhat to resemble a mural crown, while from the front, thrown over to the back, fell a splendid plume of ostrich feathers which almost reached his shoulder. His only arms, appeared to be a dagger in his girdle, and a long heavy sword, which hung from his shoulder in a baldrick of cloth of gold. The other stranger was nearly habited like the first, very little difference existing either in the fashion or the richness of their apparel. Both also, were tall and vigorous men ; and both were in the prime of their days ; but the countenance of the second was very different from that of his companion. In complexion he was fair, with small blue eyes, and rather sandy hair, nor would he have been otherwise than handsome, had it not been for a certain narrowness of brow, and wideness of mouth, which gave a gaunt and eager expression to his face, totally opposed to the grand and open countenance of the other.

As we have said, when his horse had done drinking, the first traveller turned towards the spot where Sir Osborne stood, and seemed to listen for a moment. At length he said, "Hear you the hunt now, Count William?"

"No, your Highness," replied the other, "it has swept away towards Aire."

“Then, Sir,” rejoined the first, “we are alone;” and drawing his sword from the scabbard, he laid it level before his companion’s eyes, continuing abruptly, “what think you of that blade? is it not a good one?” At the same time he fixed his eye upon him, with a firm remarking glance, as if he would have read into his very soul. The other turned as pale as death, and faltered something about its being a most excellent weapon.

“Then,” continued the first, “I will ask you, Sir Count—should it not be a bold man, who, knowing the goodness of this sword, and the strength of this arm, and the stoutness of this heart, would yet attempt anything against my life? However, Count William of Firstenberg, let me tell you, that should there be such a man in this kingdom, and should he find himself alone with me in a wild forest like this, and fail to make the attempt he meditated, I should look upon him as coward, as well as traitor; and fool, as well as villain.” And his dark eye flashed as if it would have struck him to the ground.

Count William * faltered—trembled—and attempted to reply ; but his speech failed him ; and striking his hand against his forehead, he shook his bridle rein, dug his spurs into his horse's sides, and darted down the road like lightning.

“ Slave !” cried the other as he marked him go, “ Cowardly slave !” and turning his horse, without further comment, he rode slowly on the other way.

* This circumstance is generally placed by the French anecdotarians some ten years later ; but we conceive that the precision of a Dutchman is to be relied on in preference.

CHAPTER VI.

“This battle fares like to the morning’s war
When dying clouds contend with growing light.”

SHAKSPEARE.

“Thine is th’ adventure, thine the victory,
Well has thy fortune turned the die for thee.”

DRYDEN.

SIR Osborne immediately turned into the forest, and rousing his companions, called them to horse; but however, though confessedly the hero of our story, we must leave him for a little time, and follow the traveller we have just left upon the road.

For a considerable way, he rode on musing, and if one might judge from his countenance, his meditations were somewhat bitter; such as might become the bosom of a king, on finding the treachery of the world, the hollowness of friendship, the impossibility of securing affection, or any other of the cold lessons which the world will sometimes teach the children of prosperity. At length he paused, and looking to the declining sun, saw the necessity of hastening his progress; whereupon setting spurs to his horse, he galloped along the road, without much heeding in what direction it led him, till coming to one of those openings, called carrefours by the French, where a great many roads met, he stopped to consider his farther route. In the midst, it is true, stood a tall post, which doubtless, in days of yore, pointed out to the inquisitive eye, the exact destination to which each of the several paths tended; but old Time, who gets fingering every thing that is nice and good, from the loveliest feature of living beauty, to the grandest monument of ancient art, had not spared even so contemptible a thing as the finger-post; but, like a great mischievous baby, had scratched out the letters with his pocket-knife, leaving no trace of their purport visible.

The traveller rode round it in vain—then paused, and listened, as if to catch the sounds of the distant hunt; but all was now silent.

As a last resource, he raised his hunting-horn to his lips, and blew a long and repeated call ; but all was hushed and still—even babbling echo, in pure despite, answered not a word.—He blew again, and had the same success. There was an ominous sort of quietness in the air, which, joined with the sultriness of the evening, the expecting taciturnity of the very birds, and some dark heavy clouds that were beginning to roll, in lurid masses over the trees, gave notice of an approaching storm.

Some road he must choose, and calculating as nearly as he could, by the position of the sun, he made his election, and spurred along it with all speed. A dropping sound amongst the green leaves, however, soon showed that the storm was begun, and once having commenced, it was not slow in following up its first attack : the rain came down in torrents, so as to render the whole scene misty, and the lightning, followed by its instant clap of thunder, flickered on every side with flash after flash, dazzling the traveller's sight, and scaring his horse by gleaming across his path, while the inky clouds overhead almost deprived them of other light. In vain he every now and then sought some place of shelter, where the trees seemed thickest ; the verdant canopy of the leaves, though impervious to the summer sun, and a good defence against a passing shower, were incapable of resisting a storm like that, and wherever he turned the rain poured through in torrents, and wet him to the skin. Galloping on then, in despair of finding any sufficient covering, he proceeded for nearly half an hour along the forest road, before it opened into the country ; and where it did so, instead of finding any nice village to give him rest, and shelter, and food, and fire, the horseman could distinguish nothing but a wide bare expanse of country, looking dismal and desolate in the midst of the grey deluge that was falling from the sky. About seven or eight miles farther on, he could, indeed, see faintly through the rain, the spire of some little church, giving the only sign of human habitation ; except where to the left, in the midst of the heath that there bordered the forest, he perceived the miserable little hut of a charcoal-burner, with a multitude of black hillocks before the door, and a large shed for piling up what was already prepared.

To this, then, as the nearest place of shelter, the stranger took his way, very different in appearance from what he had been in the morning; his rich dress soaked and soiled, his velvet hat out of all shape or form, his high plume draggled and thin, with all the feather adhering closely to the pen, and, in short, though still bearing the unalienable look of gentleman, yet in as complete disarray of apparel, as the very worst wetting can produce. Without ceremony, he rode up to the door, sprang off his horse, and entered the cabin, wherein appeared a good woman of about forty, busily piling up, with fresh fuel, a fire of dry boughs, over which hung a large pot of soup for the evening meal. The traveller's tale was soon told, and the dame readily promised him shelter and food, in the name of her husband, who was absent, carrying charcoal to the distant village; and seeing that the storm was likely to last all night, he tied his horse under the shed, placed himself by the side of the fire, aided the good woman to raise it into a blaze, and frankly prepared to make himself as comfortable as circumstances would permit. Well pleased with his easy good humour, the good dame soon grew familiar, gave him a spoon to skim the pot, while she fetched more wood, and bade him make himself at home. In a short time, the husband himself returned, as dripping as the traveller had been, and willingly confirmed all that his wife had promised. Only casting himself, without ceremony, into the chair where the stranger had been sitting,—and which, by the way, was the only chair in the place, all the rest being joint-stools,—he addressed him familiarly, saying, “ I take this place, by the fire, my good gentleman, because it is the place where I always sit, and this chair, because it is mine; and you know the old proverb,

“ By right and by reason whatever betide,
A man should be master by his own fire-side.”*

“ Faith, you are in the right,” cried the tra-

* We cannot help calling attention to the scrupulous accuracy of Vonderbrugius! Supposing that he might, in some fit of unwonted imaginativeness, have invented this circumstance, we searched through many tomes for confirmation, when we at last found the whole story alluded to in the exact Montluc; which, though it leaves the Dutchman no other merit than that of a compiler, justifies implicit belief in every part of this surprising history.

veller laughing, "so I will content myself with this settle. But let us have something for supper, for on the word of a —— knight, my ride has taught me hunger."

"Give us the soup, dame," cried the charcoal-burner. "Well, I wot, Sir traveller, that you might be treated like a prince, here on the edge of the wood, did not those vile forest laws prevent a poor man from spearing a boor as well as a rich one.—In good truth, the King is to blame to let such laws last."

"Faith, and that is true," cried the traveller, "and heartily to blame too, if his laws stand between me and a good supper. Now would I give a link of this gold chain, for a good steak of wild boar pork, upon those clear ashes."

The cottager looked at his wife, and the cottager's wife looked at her husband, -very like two people undecided what to do. "Fie, now!" cried the stranger, "fie, good dame! I will wager a gold piece against a cup of cold water, that if I look in that coffer, I shall find wherewithal to mend our supper."

"Ha, ha, ha!" roared the charcoal-burner, "thou hast hit it! Faith, thou hast hit it!"

There it is, my buck, sure enough! Bring it forth, dame, and give us some steaks. But mind," he continued, laying his finger on his lip, with a significant wink, "mind, mum's the word! never fare well and cry roast beef."

"Oh, I'm as close as a mouse," replied the stranger in the same strain; "never fear me, many a stout stag have I overthrown in the King's forests, without asking, with your leave or by your leave of any man."

"Ha, ha, ha!" cried the cottager, "thou'rt a brave one! Come, let us be merry, while the thunder rolls without. It will strike the King's palace sooner than my cottage, though we are eating wild boar therein."

In such sort of fit passed the evening till nightfall and the storm still continuing in its full glory, the traveller was fain to content himself with such lodging as the cottage afforded, for the night. Though his dress bespoke a rank far higher than their own, neither the cottager nor his wife seemed at all awe-struck or abashed, but quietly examined the gold-lacing of his clothes, declared it was very fine, and seemed to look upon him more as a child does upon a gilded toy, than in any other light. When night was come, the good dame strewed out one corner of the hut with a little straw, piled it high with dry leaves, and the stranger, rolling up his cloak for a pillow, laid it under his head, stretched himself on the rude bed thus prepared, and soon fell into a profound sleep.

Taking advantage of his nap, we will now return to Sir Osborne, who with all speed roused his companions from their slumbers, and bade them mount and follow. With military alacrity, Longpole was on his horse in a moment, and ready to set out; but for his part, the young Hainalter yawned and stretched, and somewhat bewildered, looked as if he would fain have asked whither the Knight was going to lead him. A word, however, from Longpole hurried his motions, and they were both soon upon the track of Sir Osborne, who was already some way on the little bridle-path by which they had arrived at the grassy mound where they had been sleeping. When he reached the road they had formerly left, he paused, and waited their coming up.

“Now, Longpole,” cried he, “give me your judgment, does this road lead to any crossing, or not? Quick! for we must not waste a moment.”

“Most certainly it does, my Lord,” replied the shield bearer, “most probably to the spot where they all meet in the heart of the wood.”

“Perhaps he may tell us with more certainty,” said the Knight; and changing his language to French, for the ear of the young Hainaulter, he asked the same question.

“Oh yes, certainly,” replied Frederick, “it leads to the great Carrefour; I have hunted here a hundred times.”

“Then, are we on French ground, or Flemish?” demanded the Knight.

“The French claim it,” replied the youth, “but we used to hunt here in their despite.”

“Quick then, let us on,” cried Sir Osborne, “and keep all your eyes on the road before, to see if any one crosses it.”

“He has something in his head, I’ll warrant,” said Longpole to their new companion, as they galloped after Sir Osborne.

“Oh, our Lord knows the trade of war; and will snuff you out an enemy, without ever seeing him, better than a beagle dog with bandy legs and a yellow spot over his eyes."

"Halt!" cried the Knight, suddenly reining in his horse as they came within sight of the Carrefour we have already mentioned. "Long-pole, keep close under that tree! Frederick, here by my side—Back him into the wood my good youth—that will do. Let every one keep their eyes upon the crossing, and when you see a horseman pass, mark which road he takes. How dark the sky is growing. Hark! is not that a horse's feet?"

They had not remained many minutes, when the cavalier we have spoken of appeared at the Carrefour, examined in vain the finger-post, sounded his horn once or twice, as we have described, and then again took his way to the left.

"Where does that road lead?" demanded the Knight, addressing the young Hainaulter.

"It opens out on the great heath, between the forest and Lillers, my Lord," answered Frederick.

“Is there any village, or castle, or house near?” asked Sir Osborne quickly.

“None, none!” replied Frederick, “it is as bare as my hand,—perhaps a Charbonier’s cottage or so,” he added, correcting himself.

“Let us on then,” replied the Knight, “we are going to have a storm, but we must not mind that;” and putting his horse into a quick pace, he led his followers upon the track of the traveller, taking care never to lose sight of him entirely, and yet contriving to conceal himself, whenever any turn of the road might have exposed him to the view of the person he pursued. The rain poured upon his head, the lightning flashed upon his path; but still the Knight followed on without a moment’s pause, till he had seen the traveller take refuge in the cottage of the charcoal-burner. Then, and not till then, he paused, spurred his horse through some thick bushes on the edge of the wood, and obtained as much shelter as the high beeches of the forest could afford; nor did he pause at the first or the thickest trees he came to, but took particular pains to select a spot, where, though concealed by a high screen of underwood, they could yet distinguish clearly the door of the hut, through the various breaks in the branches. Here, having dismounted with his followers, he stationed Frederick at a small opening, to watch the cottage, while he and Longpole carefully provided for the security and refreshment of their horses, as far as circumstances would admit, although the long forest-grass was the only food that could be procured for them, and the storm still continued pouring through the very thickest parts of the wood. To obviate this, the Knight and his shield-bearer plied the underwood behind them with their swords, and soon obtained a sufficient supply of leafy branches, to interweave with the lower boughs of the trees overhead, and thus to secure themselves against the rain.

While thus employed, Frederick gave notice as he had been commanded, that some one approached the cottage, which proved to be the Charbonier himself, returning with his mule; and after his arrival, their watch remained undisturbed by the coming of any visitor till nightfall.

As soon as it was dark, Sir Osborne allotted to his followers and to himself, the portion of the night that each was to watch, taking for his own period the first four hours; after which, Longpole's turn succeeded; and lastly, towards morning, came the young Hainaulter.

With his eye fixed upon the light in the cottage, and his ear eager for every sound, Sir Osborne passed the time till the flame gradually died away, and flashing more and more faintly, at last sunk entirely. However, the dark outline of the hut was still to be seen, and the ear had now more power; for the storm had greatly passed away, and the only sounds that it had left, were the thunder rolling faintly round the far limits of the horizon, and the dropping of the water from the leaves and branches of the forest. Towards midnight, Sir Osborne roused Longpole, and recommending him to watch carefully, he threw himself down by the young Hainaulter, and was soon asleep.

Somewhat tired with the fatigues of the day, the Knight slept soundly, and did not wake, till Frederick, who had replaced Longpole on the watch, shook him by the arm; and starting up, he found that it was day.

“Hist, hist! my Lord,” cried the youth, “here is Shoenvelt and his party.”

Sir Osborne looked through the branches in the direction the young man pointed, and clearly distinguished a party of seven spearmen, slowly moving along the side of the forest, at about five hundred yards distance from the spot where they lay. “It is Shoenvelt’s height and form,” said the Knight, measuring the leader with his eye, “and that looks like Wilsten by his side—but how are you sure?”

“Because I know the arms of both,” replied Frederick. “See, they are going to hide in the wood, close by the high road from Lillers to Aire.”

As he spoke, the body of horsemen stopped, and, one after another, disappeared in the wood, convincing Sir Osborne that the young Hainaulter was right.

“Then nerve your arm, and grasp your lance, Frederick,” said the Knight with a smile, “for if you do well, even this very day, you may win your golden spurs. Wake Longpole there! we must be all prepared.”

The youth’s eyes gleamed with delight, and snatching up his casque, he shook Longpole roughly, and ran to tighten his horse's girths, while Sir Osborne explained to the yeoman that they were upon the eve of an encounter.

“Odds life!” cried Longpole, “I ’m glad to hear it, my Lord. I find it vastly cold, sleeping in a steel jacket, and shall be glad of a few backstrokes to warm me. You say there are seven of them. It ’s an awkward number to divide, but you will take three, my Lord—I will do my best for two and a half, and then there will be one and a half for Master Frederick here. We could not leave the poor youth less, in honesty, for I dare say he is as ready for such a breakfast as we are.”

The bustle of preparation now succeeded for a moment or two; and when all was ready, and the whole party once more on horseback, the Knight led the way to a gap, from whence he could issue out upon the plain, without running the risk of entangling his horse in the underwood. Here, stationing himself behind the bushes to the left, he gave orders to Longpole and Frederick, not to stir an inch whatever they saw, till he set the example; and then grasping his lance, he sat like marble, with his eyes fixed upon the cottage.

In about a quarter of an hour, the door of the hut opened, and the cottager running to the shed, brought up the traveller's horse. By this time, he seemed to have discovered that his guest was of higher rank than he imagined, for when the stranger came forth, he cast himself upon his knees, holding the bridle, and remained in that situation till the other had sprung into the saddle.

Dropping some pieces of gold into his host's hand, the traveller now shook his rein; and putting his horse into an easy pace, took his way over the plain, at about three hundred yards distance from the forest, proceeding quietly along totally unconscious of danger. A moment, however, put an end to his security, for he had not passed above a hundred yards beyond the spot where the Knight was concealed, when a galloping of horse was heard, and Shoenvelt's party, with levelled lances, and horses in charge, rushed forth from the wood upon him.

In an instant, Sir Osborne's visor was down, his spear was in the rest, and his horse in full gallop.—“Darnley! Darnley!” shouted he, with a voice that made the welkin ring. “Darnley to the rescue! Traitor of Shoenvelt, turn to your death!”

“Darnley! Darnley!” shouted Longpole, following his lord.

“St. George for Darnley! down with the traitors.”

The shout was not lost upon either Shoenvelt or the traveller. The one instantly turned, with several of his men, to attack the Knight; the other, seeing unexpected aid at hand, fell back towards Darnley, and with admirable skill and courage, defended himself with nothing but his sword, against the lances of the marauders, who—their object being more to take him living, than to kill him—lost the advantage which they would have otherwise had, by his want of armour.

Like a wild beast, raging with hatred and fury, Shoenvelt charged towards the Knight, his lance quivering in his hand with the angry force of his grasp. On, on, bore Sir Osborne at full speed towards him, his bridle in his left hand, his shield upon his breast, his lance firmly fixed in the rest, and levelled in such manner as to avoid its breaking. In a moment they met. Shoenvelt's spear struck Sir Osborne's shield, and aimed firmly and well, partially traversed the iron; but the Knight throwing back his left arm with vast force, snapped the head of the lance in twain. In the meanwhile, his own spear, charged at the marauder's throat with unerring exactness, passed clean through the gorget piece and the upper rim of the corslet, and came bloody out at the back.—You might have heard the iron plates and bones cranch as the lance rent its way through.—Down went Shoenvelt, horse and man, borne over by the force of the Knight's course. “Darnley, Darnley!” shouted Sir Osborne, casting from him the spear which he could not disengage from the marauder's neck, and drawing his sword. “Darnley, Darnley! to the rescue! Now, Wilsten, now!” and turning, he galloped up to where the traveller, with Longpole and Frederick by his side, firmly maintained his ground against the adventurers.

Wilsten's lance had been shivered by Long-pole; and now, with his sword drawn, on the other side of the melée, he was aiming a desperate blow at the unarmed head of the traveller, who defended himself from a spearman in front; but at that moment the Knight charged the adventurer through the midst, overturning all that came in his way, and shouting loud his battle cry, to call his adversary's attention, and divert him from the fatal blow which he was about to strike. The plan succeeded. Wilsten heard the sound; and seeing Shoenvelt dead upon the plain, turned furiously on Darnley. Urging their horses between all the others, they met in the midst, and thus seemed to separate the rest of the combatants, who, for a moment or two, looked on inactive; while the swords of the two champions played about each other's heads, and sought out the weaker parts of their harness. Both were strong, and active, and skilful; and though Sir Osborne was decidedly superior, it was long before the combat appeared to turn in his favour. At length, by a quick movement of his horse, the Knight brought himself close to the adventurer's side,

At that moment, the combat having been renewed by the rest, one of the marauders struck the Knight from behind so violently on the head, that it shook him in the saddle, and breaking the fastenings of his helmet, the casque came off and rolled upon the plain. But the blow was too late to save Wilsten, who now lay dead under his horse's feet; and Sir Osborne well repaid it by a single back stroke at this new opponent's thigh.

By this time only two of the marauders remained on horseback, so well had Longpole, the traveller, and Frederick, done their devoir; and these two were not long in putting spurs to their steeds, and flying with all speed, leaving the Knight and his companions masters of the field. Looking round, however, Sir Osborne missed the gallant young Hainaulter, while he saw his horse flying masterless over the plain. "Where is Frederick?" cried the Knight, springing to the ground. "By my knight-hood, if he be dead, we have paid our victory dear!"

“Not dead, Monseigneur, but hurt,” said a faint voice near; and turning, he beheld the poor youth fallen to the earth, and leaning on one arm, while with the other he was striving to take off his casque, from the bars of which the blood dripped out fast upon the green sward. Darnley hastened to his aid; and having disencumbered him of his helmet, discovered a bad wound in his throat, which, however, did not appear to him to be mortal; and Longpole, with the stranger, having dismounted, and come to his aid, they contrived to staunch the bleeding, which was draining away his life.

When this was done, the noble traveller turned towards Darnley. “Sir Knight,” said he, with the calm dignified tone of one seldom used to address an equal, “how you came here, or why, I cannot tell, but it seems as if Heaven had sent you on purpose to save my life. However that may be, I will say of you, that never did a more famous knight wield sword; and therefore, as the best soldiers in Europe may be proud of such a companion, let me beg you to take this collar, till I can thank you better”— and he cast over the Knight's neck the golden chain of the order of St. Michael, with which he was decorated.

“As for you, good Squire,” he continued, addressing Longpole, “you are worthy of your lord, therefore kneel down.”

“Faith, your Worship,” answered the yeoman, “I never knelt to any man in my life, and never will to any but a king, while I'm in this world!”

“Fie! fie! Heartly,” cried Sir Osborne; “bend your knee. It is the King, man!—Do you not understand?—It is King Francis!”

“Oh, that changes the case,” cried Longpole; “I crave your Highness' pardon. I did not know your Grace”—and he bent his knee to the King.

Francis drew his sword, and laid it on the yeoman's shoulder; then striking him three light blows, he said, “In the name of God, our Lady, and St. Denis, I dub thee Knight. Avance, bon Chevalier! Noble, or not noble, from this moment I make you such.”

Longpole rose, and the King turned to the young Hainaulter, who sitting near, and supporting himself by his sword, had looked on with longing eyes. "No one of my gallant defenders must be forgotten," said Francis. "Knighthood, my good youth, will hardly pay your wound."

"Oh yes, yes!" cried Frederick eagerly, "indeed it will, your Highness, more than repay it."

"Then be it so," replied the King, knight-ing him. "However, remember, fair Knights, that Francis of France stints not here his gratitude, or you may think him niggard of his thanks. We will have you all go with us, and we will find better means to repay your timely aid.—I know not, Sir," he continued, turning to Sir Osborne, and resuming the more familiar first person singular, "whether I heard your battle cry aright, and whether I now see the famous Lord Darnley, the Knight of Burgundy, who in wars, now happily ended, often turned the tide of battle in favour of the Emperor."—Sir Osborne bowed his head.—"Then, Sir," continued Francis, "I will say, that never did monarch receive so much injury or so much benefit from the hand of one noble adversary."

CHAPTER VII.

“ We talk in ladies’ chambers, love and news.”

COWLEY.

ALL was bustle and preparation at the Court of England, for the two most magnificent monarchs of the world were about to contend with each other, not with the strife of arms, nor by a competition of great deeds, but in pomp, in pageant, and in show,—in empty glitter and unfruitful display. However that may be, the palace and all its precincts became the elysium of tailors, embroiderers, and sempstresses. There might you see many a shady form gliding about from apartment to apartment, with smiling looks and extended shears, or armed with ell-wands more potent than Mercury’s rod, driving many a poor soul to perdition, and transforming his goodly acres into velvet suits, with tags of cloth of gold.

The courts of the King's Palace of Bridewell rang from morning till night with the neighing of steeds, the clanking of harness, and the sound of the trumpet; and the shops and warehouses of London were nearly emptied of gold, of jewels, and brocade. Men and women were all wild to out-do their French equals in splendour and display; and, in short, the mad dog of extravagance seemed to have bit all the world.

In a small room in the palace, not far from the immediate apartments of the Queen, sat a very lovely girl, whom the reader has not spoken to for a long time—no other than Lady Katrine Bulmer—who, with a more pensive air than was usual with her, sat deep in the mysteries of bibs and tuckers, chaperons and fraises, muntuas and hanging sleeves, which last had, for the moment, regained their ascendancy in the public task, and were now ornamented with more extraordinary trimmings than ever.

By her side sat her two women, Geraldine and Bridget, whose fingers were going with the rapidity of lightning, quickened into excessive haste by the approaching removal of the Court to Calais, which was to take place in the short space of one week, while their mistress's dresses were not half-finished, and their own not began.

What it was that occupied Lady Katrine's thoughts, and made her gay face look grave, is nothing to any one. Perhaps it might be, that she had not as many dresses as Lady Winifred Stanton : perhaps she had seen a jewel that she could not afford to buy : perhaps Higglemeasure the merchant had brought her a brocade that the Queen would not let her wear : perhaps she was vexed at not having seen Lord Darby for eight days — the last time having been on the same morning that Sir Osborne Maurice had been driven from the Court. Perhaps she was angry with herself for having parted from him with an affectation of indifference which she did not feel.

Well aware, that now Wolsey had returned, the pleasure of seeing her lover almost daily, must cease ; and that a stiff and formal interview, in presence of the whole court, or a few brief sentences at a mask or pageant, was all they could hope to attain, Lady Katrine did indeed repent that she had suffered her own caprices to mingle any bitter in the few happy hours that fate had sent her.

Though she had some vanity too, she had not enough to prevent her seeing and regretting that she had been in fault : and she made those resolutions of amendment, which a light spirit often forms every hour, and breaks before the next : and thus sewing and thinking, and thinking and sewing, and stitching-in excellent determinations in every seam as she went along, she revolved in her own mind all the various events that had lately happened at the court.

It may well be supposed, that the sudden disappearance of Sir Osborne Maurice, at the same time as that of Lady Constance de Grey, had given rise to many strange rumours, none of which, of course, did Lady Katrine believe : and, to do her justice, although perhaps she was not at all sorry that Constance had judged it right to put an end to any farther proceedings regarding her marriage with Lord Darby, by removing herself from the Court; yet Lady Katrine suffered no one to hint a doubt in her presence regarding her friend's conduct. But that which was much more in Constance's favour, was the good word of the Queen herself, who at once silenced scandal by saying, that she would take upon herself to assert, that Lady Constance de Grey had never dreamed of flying from the Court with Sir Osborne Maurice. It was very natural, she observed, that a young heiress of rank, and wealth, and a proud family, should take refuge any where, rather than contract a marriage to which she had always expressed her repugnance; and without meaning offence to the Lord Cardinal, she could not think but that Constance was right.

Notwithstanding this, many were the tales that were circulated by the liemongers of the Court; and it hurt the really generous heart of Lady Katrine to hear them. Meditating then over all these circumstances, nearly in the same desultory way in which they are here written down, she took little notice, when one of the servants of the palace called her maid Geraldine out of the room. After a short while, Geraldine came back, and called out Bridget, and still Lady Katrine continued to work on. After a moment or two she ceased, and leaning her head on her hand, gave herself up to still deeper thought, when suddenly the door opened, and Lord Darby presented himself.

Too much taken by surprise to give herself any airs, Lady Katrine looked up with a smile of unaffected delight, and Darby, reading his welcome in her eyes, advanced, and casting his arm round her, imprinted a warm kiss on the full arching lips, that smiled too temptingly for human philosophy to resist. Luckily did it happen that he did so within the first minute, for, had he waited later, Lady Katrine might not so easily have pardoned his boldness. However, her only remark was, "Well, Darby, you seem to think it so much a matter of course, that I suppose I must let it pass as such too. But don't look so happy, man, lest I should take it into my head to make you look otherwise before you go."

“Nay, nay, Katrine,” said Lord Darby, “not so, when I come solely for the purpose of asking you to make me happy.”

The Earl spoke seriously, tenderly, and there was so much hope and affection, and feeling in his glance, that Lady Katrine felt there must be some meaning in his words. “If you love me, Darby,” cried she, “tell me what you mean—and make haste, for my maids will be back, and you know you must not stay here.”

“Yes, but I may, Katrine,” replied he; “no one but you can now send me away.—In a word, dear girl, to put an end to suspense, I have the King’s and the Cardinal’s consent to ask your hand, and the Queen’s to seek you here—Will you refuse me?”

Lady Katrine looked at him for a moment, to be sure—quite sure that what she heard was true; then dropping her head upon his shoulder, she burst into a violent flood of tears. So sudden, so delightful was the change in all her feelings, that she was surprised out of all her reserve, all her coquetry, and could only murmur, “Refuse you—no!” But starting up, at length she cried, "I have a great mind that I will too. Don't think that I love you—No, I hate you most bitterly for making me cry—you did it on purpose, beyond doubt, and I won't forgive you easily—so, to begin your punishment, go away, and leave me directly."

"Nay, Katrine, I must disobey," replied the Earl, "for I have other news to tell you—your relation, Lord Orham, is dead."

"My relation?" cried Lady Katrine, whose tears were ever dried as soon as shed.

"Oh yes! I remember, he was my great-grandfather's seventieth cousin by the mother's side. One was descended from Shem, and the other from Japheth, in the time of the flood, or before, for aught I know. Well, what of my antediluvian relative—oh, he is dead, you say—may he rest with Noah!"

"But you must take mourning for him," said Lord Darby laughing, "indeed you must."

"Certainly," replied Lady Katrine, "a coif and a widow's hood. But I won't be teased, Darby—I will tease every body, and nobody shall tease me.—As to going into mourning for the old miser just now, when all my finery is ready made, to show myself at Guisnes, and captivate all hearts, and make you fight fifty single combats,—I won't do it. There, go and ask my singing-bird to moult in the month of May, or any thing else of the same kind, but don't ask me to leave one single row of lace off my sleeve, for the miser—I disown him."

"Hush, hush, hush!" cried the Earl, "Take care he does not come back, and disown you, for otherwise you are his heiress."

"I!" exclaimed Lady Katrine, "Am I his heiress? Now, Mistress Fortune, I am your very humble servant. Bless us, what a much more important person Katrine Bulmer will be, with all the heavy coffers of her late dear cousin, than when she was poor Katrine Bulmer, the Queen's woman—Darby I give you notice: I shall not marry you—I could wed a Duke now, doubtless—who shall it be? All the Dukes have wives, I do believe. However, there is many a peer richer than you are, and though you do count cousinship with kings, gold is my passion now, so I will sell myself to him that has the most."

Though she spoke in jest, still Lord Darby was mortified; for what he could have borne and laughed at in the poor and fortuneless girl that had captivated his heart, his spirit was too proud to endure, where a mercenary motive could be for a moment attributed to him. "Nay, Katrine," said he, "if the fortune that is now yours, gives you any wish of change, your promises to me are null—I render them back to you from this moment."

"Why they were made under very different circumstances, you must allow, Lord Darby," replied she, assuming a most malicious air of gravity, and delighted at having found, for the first time in her life, the means of putting her lover out of humour.

"They were, Lady Katrine," answered the Earl, much more deeply hurt than she imagined, and therefore they are at an end—I have nothing farther then but to take my leave.

"Good bye, my Lord, Good bye!" cried

she. "Heaven bless and prosper you," and with the utmost tranquillity she watched him approach the door. "Now shall I let him go or not?" said she. "Oh woman! woman! you are a great fool!—Darby—Darby!" she added in a soft voice, "come back to your Katrine."

Lord Darby turned back and caught her in his arms. "Dear teasing girl!" cried he, "why, why will you strive to wring a heart that loves you?"

"Nay, Darby, if things were rightly stated, it is I who have cause to be offended rather than you," answered the Lady. "What right had you, Sir, to think that the heart of Katrine Bulmer was so base, so mean, as to be changed by the possession of a few paltry counters. Own that you have done me wrong this instant, or I will never forgive you. Down upon your knee—a kneeling confession! or you are condemned beyond hope of grace."

Lord Darby was fain to obey his gay lady's behest, and bending his knee, he freely confessed himself guilty of all the crimes she thought proper to charge him withal; in the midst of which, however, he was interrupted by the entrance of an attendant sent by the Queen to call Lady Katrine to her presence.

The lady laughed and blushed, at being found with Lord Darby at her feet; and the Earl, not particularly well pleased at the interruption, turned to the Usher, saying, with the sort of nonchalant air which he often assumed, "Well, Sir, before you go, tell the lady, when it was you last found me on my knees, to any of the fair dames of the court?"

"Never, my Lord, so please you, that I know of," answered the man, somewhat surprised.

"Well then," rejoined Darby, "next time, knock at the door, for fear you should. In which case, you might chance to be thrown down stairs by the collar."

"Hush, hush, Darby!" cried Lady Katrine, "I must go to her Highness. Doubtless we shall not meet again for a long while, so fare you well!" and tripping away after the Usher, without other adieu, she left her lover to console himself in her absence, as best he might.

On entering the Queen's apartment, she found her royal mistress alone with the King, and according to etiquette, was drawing back instantly, when Katherine called her forward: "Come hither, my wild namesake," said the Queen, "his Grace the King wishes to speak with you. Come near, and answer him all his questions."

Lady Katrine advanced, and kneeling on a velvet cushion at Henry's feet, prepared to reply to whatever he might ask, with as much propriety as she could command; although the glad news of the morning had raised her spirits to a pitch of uncontrollable joyousness, which even the presence of the imperious monarch himself could hardly keep within bounds.

"Well, my merry mistress," said the King, seeing in her laughing eyes the ebullition of her heart's gladness; "it seems that you do not pine yourself to death, for the loss of Sir Osborne Maurice?"

"I deeply regret, your Grace," said Lady Katrine, turning grave for a moment, "most deeply, that Sir Osborne Maurice should have incurred your royal displeasure, for he seemed to me as perfect a knight, and as noble a gentleman, as I ever saw. But in no other respect do I regret his absence."

"Well, we have tried to supply his place with one you may like better," said Henry. "Have you seen the Earl of Darby,—ha? What think you of the exchange, pretty one?"

"I thank your Grace's bounty," said the gay girl, "I have seen his Lordship, and looked at him well; and though he be neither so handsome as Narcissus, nor so wise as Solon, he may do well enough for such a giddy thing as I am. Saving your Grace's presence, one does not look for perfection in a husband: one might as well hope to find a pippin without a spot."

"Thou art a malapert chit, Kate," said the Queen laughing, "sure I am, if your royal lord was not right gentle in his nature, he would be angry with your wild chattering."

"Nay! let her run on," said the King, "a tongue like her's has no guile. If you are contented, sweetheart," he added, addressing Lady Katrine, "that is enough."

"Oh yes! quite contented, your Grace," answered she, "I have not had a new plaything so long, that a husband is quite a treat—I suppose he must be sent to the menage first, like the jennet your Highness gave me, to learn his paces.”

“ If he was as untamed as you are, Mistress,” answered the King, “ he might need it.—But to another subject, fair one. You were with Sir Osborne Maurice and his party, when he encountered the rioters near Rochester. Some sad treasons are but too surely proved against that luckless young man; yet I would fain believe that his misconduct went not to the extent which was at first reported; especially as the accusation was made by that most ruffianly traitor, Sir Payan Wileton, whom the keen eye of my zealous Wolsey, has discovered to be stained with many crimes too black for words to paint. Now, amongst other things it was urged, that this Sir Osborne was in league with those Rochester mutineers, the greatest proof of which, was their letting him quietly pass with so small a party, when they boldly attacked the company of Lord Thomas Howard, with ten times the force.”

Lady Katrine could hardly wait till the King had ceased. "This shows," cried she at length, "how the keenest wisdom, and the noblest heart, may be abused by a crafty tale. Sir Osborne knew nothing of the rioters, my Lord; he took every way to avoid them, because I, unluckily, having neither father nor brother to protect me, encumbered him by my presence; otherwise, without doubt, he would have delivered the poor priest they had with them by his lance, and not by fair words. Never believe a word of it, your Grace. His shield-bearer, indeed, while the Knight drew up his men to defend us, to the best of his power, recognized the leader of the tumultuaries, as an old fellow-soldier, and craved leave of his Lord to go and demand a free passage for us, by which means we escaped.—Oh, my Lord, as you are famous for your clemency and justice, examine well the whole tale of that Sir Payan Wileton, and it will be found false and villainous, as are all the rest of his actions."

"You are eloquent, lady fair," said the King with a smile, "we will tell Darby to look to it.—But as to Sir Payan Wileton, his baseness is now known to us, and as we progress down to Dover, we will send a serjeant-at-arms to bring him with us to Calais, where we will, with our council, hear and judge the whole. Then if he be the man we think him, not only shall he restore to the old Lord Fitzbernard the Lordship of Chilham and the Stewardship of Dover, but shall stoop his head to the axe without grace or pardon, as I live.—But say, know you aught of Lady Constance de Grey, in whose secrets you are supposed to have had a share? Laugh not, pretty one, for by my life it shall go hard with you, if you tell not the truth.”

“Oh, please your Grace, don't have my head cut off,” cried Lady Katrine, seeing, notwithstanding the King's threat, that he was in one of his happier moods. “I never told a lie in my life, except one day when I said I did not love your Highness, and that was when you put off the pageant of the Castle Dolorous till after Pentecost, and I wanted it directly. But on my word, as I hope to be married in a year, and a widow in God's good time, I know no more of where Constance de Grey is, or where she went, or when, or how, than the child unborn."

"Did she never speak to you thereof, my saucy Mistress?" demanded Henry. "You consorted with her much, 'twere strange if she did not let something fall concerning her purposes, and she a woman too."

"I wish I had a secret," said Lady Katrine, half-apart, half-aloud, "just to show how a woman can keep counsel, if it were but in spite.—Good, your Grace," she continued, "you do not think that Constance would trust her private thoughts to such a light-headed thing as I am. But, to set your Highness' mind at ease, I vow and protest, by the love and duty I bear to you, and my royal Mistress—by my conscience, which is tender—and by my honour, which is strong,—that I know nothing of Lady Constance de Grey, and that even in my very best imaginings, I cannot divine where she is gone."

"Your Highness may believe her," said the Queen; "wild as she is, she would not stain her lips with the touch of falsehood, I am sure.

—Get ye gone, Kate, and hasten your sempstresses, for we shall set out a day before it was intended, and mind you plume up your brightest feathers, for we must outdo the Frenchwomen.”

“Oh, good, your Grace! I shall never be ready in time,” replied the young lady. “Besides, they tell me I must put on mourning for my fiftieth cousin by the side of Adam, old Lord Orham the miser. If I do, it shall be gold crape, trimmed with cobwebs, I declare; and so I humbly take my leave of both your Graces.”

Thus saying, she rose from the cushion, dropped a low curtsy to the King and Queen, and tripped away to her own apartments.

Common bustle, and ordinary preparation, may be easily imagined. Every one can, without difficulty, figure to themselves the turmoil preparatory to a ball where there are six daughters to marry, with much blood and very little money. The lady mother scolding the housekeeper in her room, and the housekeeper scolding all the servants in her's;—a reasonable number of upholsterers, decorators, floor-chalk-ers, confectioners, milliners; much talking to very little purpose; scheming, drilling, and dressing; agitation on the part of the young ladies, and calculation on the part of their mamma.—And at the end of a few weeks the matter is done and over. But no mind, however vast may be its powers of conceiving a bustle, can imagine any thing like the court of Westminster for the three days prior to the King's departure for Canterbury.

So continual were the demands upon every kind of artisan, that the impossibility of executing them, threw several into despair. One tailor, who is reported to have undertaken to furnish fifty embroidered suits in three days, on beholding the mountain of gold and velvet that cumbered his shop-board, saw, like Brutus, the impossibility of victory, and, with Roman fortitude, fell on his own shears. Three armourers are said to have been completely melted with the heat of their furnaces; and an unfortunate goldsmith swallowed molten silver to escape the persecutions of the day.

The road from London to Canterbury was covered during one whole week with carts and waggon, mules, horses, and soldiers; and so great was the confusion, that marshals were at length stationed to keep the whole in order, which of course increased the said confusion an hundred fold. So many were the ships passing between Dover and Calais, that the historians affirm, they jostled each other on the road, like a herd of great black porkers; and it is known as a fact, that the number of persons collected in the good town of Calais, was more than it could lodge, so that not only the city itself, but all the villages round about were full to the overflowing.

At length the King set out, accompanied by an immense train, and left London comparatively a desert; while as he went from station to station, he seemed like a shepherd driving all the better classes of the country before him, and leaving not a single straggler behind. His farther progress, however, was staid for a time at Canterbury, by the news that the Emperor Charles, his wife's nephew, was on the sea before Dover, furnished with the excuse of relationship for visiting the English king, though in reality conducted thither solely by the wish to break the good understanding of the English and French monarchs; or rather to ensure that no treaty contrary to his interest, should be negociated at the approaching meeting.

With that we have nothing to do; and it is a maxim which a historian should always follow, never to mind any body's business but his own. We shall therefore only say, that the King and Wolsey, occupied with the reception of the Emperor, and his entertainment, during the short time he staid, entirely forgot Sir Payan Wileton till they reached Dover, when some one happening to call it a chilly morning, put Chilham Castle in Wolsey's head, (for on such little pivots turn all the wheels of the world,) and immediately a sergeant-at-arms, with a body of horse-archers, was sent to arrest the worthy Knight, and to bring him to Calais, for which port the King and the whole court embarked immediately after; and, with a fair wind and a fine sky, arrived in safety towards the evening.

CHAPTER VIII.

With clouds and storms
Around thee thrown, tempest on tempest rolled.

THOMSON.

PASSING over all the consultations that took place between the Prioress of Richborough, Dr. Wilbraham, and Lady Constance de Grey, regarding the means of crossing the sea to France with greater security; although manifold were the important considerations therein discussed, we shall merely arrive at the conclusion to which they came at length, and which was ultimately determined by the voice of the Prioress. This was, that for several days, Lady Constance and Mrs. Margaret should remain at the convent as nuns, paying a very respectable sum for their board and lodging, while Dr. Wilbraham was to take up his abode at a cottage hard by. By this means, the Superior said, they would avoid any search which the Cardinal might have instituted to discover them, in the vessels of passage between France and England; and at the end of a week, they would easily find some foreign ship, which would carry them over to Boulogne. Such a one, she undertook to procure, by means of a fisherman who supplied the convent; and who, as she boasted, knew every ship that sailed through the Channel, from the biggest man-of-war to the meanest carvel.

We shall now leave in silence also, the time which Lady Constance passed in the convent. Vonderbrugius, who, as the sagacious reader has doubtless observed, had a most extraordinary partiality for detailing little particulars, and incidents that are of no manner of consequence, here occupies sixteen pages, with a correct and minute account of every individual day, telling how many masses the nuns sung, how often they fasted in the week, and how often they ate meat; and, not content with relating all that concerned Lady Constance, he indulges in some very illiberal insinuations in regard to the Prioress, more than hinting that she loved her bottle, and had a pet confessor.

Maintaining, however, our grave silence upon this subject, as not only irrelevant but ungentlemanlike, we shall merely say, that the days passed tranquilly enough with Lady Constance, although, like the timid creatures of the forest, whom the continual tyranny of the strong over the inoffensive, has taught to start even at a sound, she would tremble at every little circumstance, which for a moment interrupted the dull calm of the convent's solitude.

A week passed in this manner, and yet the Prioress declared her old fisherman had heard of no vessel that could forward Constance on her journey, though the young lady became uneasy at the delay, and pressed her much to make all necessary inquiries. At length, happening one morning to express her uneasiness to Mrs. Margaret, the shrewd waiting-woman, who, with an instinctive sagacity inherent in chamber-maids, knew a thousand times more of the world than either her mistress or Dr.

Wilbraham, at once solved the mystery by saying,—

“ Lord love you, Lady, there will never be a single ship in the Channel that you will hear of, so long as you pay a gold mark a day to the Prioress while we stay.”

“ I would rather give her a hundred marks to let me go,” replied Constance, “ than a single mark to keep me. But what is to be done, Margaret ?”

“ Oh, if you will let me but promise fifty marks, Lady,” replied the maid, “ I will warrant that we are in France in three days.”

Lady Constance willingly gave her all manner of leave and licence, and, accordingly, that very night, Mrs. Margaret told the chamberer, under the most solemn vows of secrecy, that her lady intended to give the Prioress, as a gift to the convent, fifty golden marks, on the day that she took ship. “ But,” said the abigail, “ it costs the poor lady so much, what with paying the chaplain’s keep at the cottage, and my wage money, which you know I must have, that her purse is running low, and I fear me, she will not be able to do as much for the house as she intends.—But mind, you promised to tell no one.”

“As I hope for salvation, it shall never pass my lips!” replied the chamberer; and away she ran to the refectory, where she bound the refectory-woman by a most tremendous vow, not to reveal the tidings she was about to communicate. The refectory-woman vowed with a great deal of facility; and the moment the chamberer was gone, she carried in a jelly to the Prioress, where with a low curtsy, and an important whisper, she communicated to the Superior the important news. Thereupon, the Prioress was instantly smitten with a violent degree of anxiety about Lady Constance’s escape, and sending down to the fisherman, she commanded him to find a ship instantly, going to France. To which the fisherman replied, that he knew of no ship going exactly to France, but that there was one lying off the sands, which would doubtless take the lady over for a few broad pieces.

Thus were the preliminaries for Constance’s escape brought about, in a very short space of time; and the fisherman having arranged with the captain, that he was to take the lady, the chaplain, and the waiting-maid, to Boulogne for ten George nobles, early the next morning Lady Constance took leave of the Prioress, made her the stipulated present, and, accompanied by good Dr. Wilbraham and her woman, followed the fisherman to the sands, where his boat waited to convey them to a vessel that lay about a mile from the shore.

The sea was calm and tranquil, but to Constance, who had little of a heroine in her nature, it seemed very rough; and every time the boat rose over a wave, she fancied that it must inevitably pitch under the one that followed. However, their passage to the ship was soon over, and as she looked at the high black sides of the vessel, the lady found a greater degree of security in its aspect, imagining it better calculated to battle with the wild waves, than the little flimsy bark that had borne her thither.

The ship, the fisherman had informed her, was a foreign merchantman, and as she came alongside, a thousand strange tongues, gabbling all manner of languages, met her ear. It was a floating tower of Babel. In the midst of the confusion, and bustle, which occurred in getting herself and her companions upon the deck, she saw that one of the sailors attempted to spring from the ship into the boat, but was restrained by those about him, who unceremoniously beat him back with marling spikes, and rope's ends ; and for the time she beheld no more of him, though she thought she heard some one uttering invectives and complaints in the English language.

For the first few moments after she was on deck, what with the giddiness occasioned by her passage in the boat, and the agitation of getting on board, she could remark nothing that was passing around her ; but the moment she had sufficiently recovered to regard the objects by which she was surrounded, a new cause of apprehension presented itself, for close by her side, evidently as commander of the vessel, stood no less distinguished a person than the Portingal captain, of whom honourable mention is made in the first volume of this sage history, and whose proboscis was not easily to be forgot.

It was too late now, however, to recede ; and her only resource was to draw down her nun's veil, hoping thus to escape being recognised. For some time, she had reason to believe that the disguise she had assumed would be effectual with the Portingal, who, as we may remember, had seen her but once ; for, occupied in giving orders for weighing anchor, and making sail, he took no notice whatever of his fair passenger, and seemed totally to have forgotten her person. But this was not the case : his attention had been first awakened to Lady Constance herself, by the sight of Dr. Wilbraham, whose face he instantly remembered ; and a slight glance convinced him that the young nun was the bright lady he had seen in Sir Payan's halls.

Though there were few of the pleasant little passions which make a man a devil, that the worthy Portingal did not possess to repletion, it sometimes happened that one battled against the other, and foiled it in its efforts ; but being withal somewhat of a philosopher, after a certain fashion, it was a part of his internal policy, on which he prided himself, to find means of gratifying each of the contending propensities, when it was possible ; and when it was not possible, to satisfy the strongest, with as little offence to the other as might be. In the present instance, he had several important points to consider: though he felt strongly inclined to carry Lady Constance with him on a voyage which he was about to make to the East Indies, yet there might be danger in the business, if the young lady had really taken the veil, not only danger in case of his vessel being searched by any cruizer he might encounter, but even danger from his own lawless crew, who though tolerably free from prejudices, still retained a certain superstitious respect for the Church of Rome, and for the things it had rendered sacred, which the worthy captain had never been able to do away with. This consideration would have deterred him from any evil attempt upon the fair girl, whom he otherwise seemed to hold completely in his power, had it not been for the additional incentive of the two large leathern bags, which had been committed into his charge at the same time with the young lady; and which, by the relation of their size to their weight, he conceived must contain a prize of some value. Determined by this, he gave orders for making all sail down the Channel, and the ship being fairly under weigh, he could resist no longer the temptation which the opportunity presented, of courting the good graces of his fair passenger. Approaching then with an air of, what he conceived, mingled dignity and sweetness, his head swinging backwards and forwards on the end of his long neck, and his infinite nose protruded like a pointer's, when he falls upon the game, — “Ah, ah! my very pretty gal,” cried he, “you see you be oblige to have recourse to me at last.”

“My good friend,” said Dr. Wilbraham, struggling with the demon of sea-sickness, which had grasped him by the stomach, and was almost squeezing his soul out, “you had better let the lady alone, for she is so sick she cannot attend to you, though doubtless you mean to be civil in your way.”

“You go to the debil, master chaplain,” replied the captain, “and preach to hims imps— I say, my very pretty mistress, suppose you were to pull up this dirty black veil, and show your charming face," and he drew aside the young lady's veil, in spite of her effort to hold it down.

At the helm, not far from where the young lady sat, stood a sturdy seaman, who by his clear blue eye, fresh weather-beaten countenance, and bluff unshrinking look, one might have easily marked out as an English sailor. Leaning on the tiller by which he was steering the vessel on her course, he had marked his worthy captain's conduct with a sort of contemplative frown, but when, stooping down, the Portingallo tore away Lady Constance's veil, and amused himself by staring in her face, the honest sailor stretched out his foot, and touched him on a protuberant part of his person which presented itself behind. The captain, turning sharply round, eyed him like a demon, but the Englishman stood his glance with a look of steady non-chalant resolution, that was not easy to put down.

"I say, Portingallo," said he, "do you want me to heave you overboard?"

"You heave me overboard, you mutinous thief!" cried the captain; "I'll have you strung up to the yard-arm, you vaggelboned, I will."

"You 'll drown a little first, by the nose of the tinker of Ashford," replied the other; "but hark you, Portingallo, let the young Lady Nun alone; or, as I said before, by the nose of the tinker of Ashford, I'll heave you overboard; and then I'll make the crew a'ration, and tell them what a good service I've done 'em; and I'll lay down the matter in three heads; first, as you were a rascal; second, as you were a villain; and third, as you were a blackguard: then I will show how, first, you did wrong to a passenger; second, how you did wrong to a lady; and third, how you did wrong to a nun; for the first, you deserve to flogged; for the second, you deserve to be kicked; and for the third you are devilish likely to be hanged, with time and God's blessing."

For a moment or two, the Portingallo was somewhat confounded by the eloquence of the Englishman, who was in fact no other than Timothy Bradford, the chief of the Rochester rioters: recovering himself speedily, however, he retaliated pretty warmly, yet did not dare to come to extremities with his rebellious steersman, as Bradford having taken refuge on board his vessel, with four or five of his principal associates, commanded too strong a party on board to permit very strict discipline. It was a general rule of the amiable captain, never to receive two men that, to his knowledge, had ever seen one another before; but several severe losses in his crew had, in the present instance, driven him into an error, which he now felt bitterly, not being half so much master of his own wickedness as he used to be before. Nevertheless, he did not fail to express his opinion of the helmsman's high qualities, in no very measured terms, threatening a great deal more than he dared perform, of which both parties were well aware.

“Come, come, Portingallo,” cried the helmsman, “you know very well what is right as well as another, and I say you shan't molest the lady:—another thing, master, you treat that poor lubberly Jekin like a brute, and I'll not see it done, so look to it.—But I'll tell you what, captain, let us mind what we are about. These dark clouds that are gathering there to leeward, and coming up against the wind, mean something.—Better take in sail.”

The effect of this conversation was to free Constance from the persecution of the captain; and turning her eyes in the direction to which the sailor pointed, she saw, rolling up in the very face of the wind, some heavy leaden clouds, tipped with a lurid reddish hue wherever they were touched by the sun. Above their heads, and to windward, the sky was clear and bright, obscured by nothing but an occasional light cloud, that flitted quickly over the heaven, drawing after it a soft shadow, that passed like an arrow over the gay waves, which all around were dancing joyously in the sunshine.

By this time, the English coast was becoming fainter and more faint; the long line of cliffs and headlands massing together, covered with an airy and indistinct light, while the shores of France seemed growing out of the waters, with heavy piles of clouds towering above them, and seeming to advance with menacing mien, towards the rocks of England. Still, though the eye might mark them rolling one over another, in vast dense volumes, looking fit receptacles for the thunder and the storm, the clouds seemed to make but little progress, contending with the opposing wind, while mass after mass accumulating from behind, appeared to bring up new force to the dark front of the tempest.

Still the ship sped on, and the wind being full in her favour, made great way through the water, so that it was likely they would reach Boulogne before the storm began; and the captain, now obliged to abandon any evil purpose he might have conceived towards Lady Constance, steered towards the shore of France to get rid of her as soon as possible. From time to time, every eye on board was turned towards the lowering brow of heaven, and then always dropped to the French coast, to ascertain how near was the tempest, and how far the haven; and Constance, not sufficiently sick to be heedless of danger, ceased not to watch the approaching clouds and the growing shore, with alternate hope and fear. Gradually the hills towards Boulogne, the cliffs, and the sands, with dark lines of tower, and wall, and citadel, and steeple, began to grow more and more distinct, and the Portingal was making a tack to run into the harbour, when the vane at the mast-head began to quiver, and in a moment after turned suddenly round. Cries and confusion of every sort succeeded; one of the sails was completely rent to pieces, and the ship received such a sudden shock, that Constance was cast from her seat upon the deck, and poor Dr. Wilbraham rolled over, and almost pitched out at the other side. Soon, however, the yards were braced round, the vessel was put upon another tack, and from a few words that passed between the captain and the steersman, Constance gathered, that as they could not get into Boulogne, they were about to run for Whitesand haven as the nearest port.

“Go down below, Lady, go down below, and tell your beads,” cried the bluff steersman, as he saw Constance sitting and holding herself up by the binnacle. “Here, Jekey, help her down.”

“Lord ’a mercy, we shall all be drowned, I am sure we shall,” cried our old friend Jekin Groby, coming forward transformed into the likeness of a bastard sailor, his new profession sitting upon him with inconceivable awkwardness, and the Kentish clothier shining forth in every movement of his inexpert limbs. "Lord 'a mercy upon us, we shall all be drowned as sure as possible! Mistress Nun, let me help you down below—It's more comfortable to be drowned down stairs, they say—There's a flash of lightning I declare! Mercy upon us! We shall all go to the bottom. This is the worst storm I've seen, since that Portingallo vagabond kidnapped me, by the help of the devil and Sir Payan Wileton—Let me help you down below, Mrs. Nun—Lord bless you it's no trouble, I'm going down myself."

Constance, however, preferred staying upon deck, where she could watch the progress of their fate, to remaining below in a state of uncertainty, and consequently resisted the honest persuasions of good Jekin Groby, who, finding her immoveable, slipped quietly below unobserved, and hid himself in an empty hammock, courageously making up his mind to be drowned, if he could but be drowned asleep.

In the mean time the storm began to grow more vehement, the wind coming in violent quick gusts, and the clouds spreading far and wide over the face of the sky, with a threatening blackness of hue, and heavy slowness of flight, that menaced their instant descent. As yet, no second flash of lightning had succeeded the first, and no drop of rain had fallen; and though the ship laboured violently with the waves, excited into tumult by the sudden change of wind, still running on, she seemed in a fair way of reaching Whitesand in safety. Presently, another bright flash blazed through the sky, and seemed to rend it from the horizon to the zenith, while instant upon the red path of its fiery messenger, roared forth the voice of the thunder, as if it would annihilate the globe. Another now succeeded, and another, till the ear and the eye were almost deafened by the din, and blinded by the light; while slow, large drops came dripping from the heaven, like tears wrung by agony from a giant's eyes. Then came a still and death-like pause—the thunder ceased, the wind hushed, and the only sounds that met the ear were the rushing of the waves by the ship's side, and the pattering of each big raindrop as it fell on the deck ; while a small sea-bird kept wheeling round the vessel, and screaming, as with a sort of fiendish joy, to see it labouring with the angry billows. Soon again, however, did the storm begin with redoubled fury, and the lightnings flashed more vividly than ever, covering all the sky with broad blue sheets of light, while still in the midst of the whole blaze appeared a narrow zigzag line of fire, so bright that it made the rest look pale.

Still Constance kept upon the deck, and drawing her hood over her head, strove to fix herself amidst the pitching of the vessel, by clinging to the binnacle, which in ships of that day was often supported by a couple of oblique bars. Seeing, in a momentary cessation of the storm, the eye of the steersman fix upon her with a look of somewhat like pity, she ventured to ask if they were in much danger.

“Danger ! bless you, no, lady,” cried the man ; “only a little thunder and lightning ; no danger in life.—But you had better go below,—there’s no danger—”

As he spoke, another bright flash caused

Constance to close her eyes, but a tremendous crash, which made itself audible even through the roar of the thunder, as well as a heavy roll of the vessel, gave her notice that the lightning had struck somewhere; and looking up, to her horror, she beheld the mainmast shivered almost to atoms by the lightning, and rolled over the ship's side, to which it was still attached by a mass of blazing cordage.

“Cut! cut! cut!” vociferated the steersman, amidst the unavailing shouts and bustling inactivity of the crew; “cut! you Portingallo vagabonds! You'll have the ship on fire. The idiots are staring, as if they never saw such a thing before. Here, captain, take the helm. D—— you to h——, take the helm!” And springing forward, with an energy to which the danger of the moment seemed to lend additional impulse, he scattered the frightened Portuguese and impassible Dutchmen, who were unclueing ropes and disentangling knots, and catching up a hatchet, soon cut sheer through the thicker rigging; and with a roll the blazing remnants of the mast pitched into the sea, leaving nothing on fire behind, but some scattered cordage, which the Englishman and his companions gradually extinguished.

In the meanwhile the mast still flaming in the water swung round the ship, and the Portingallo, whose presence of mind did not seem of the very first quality, brought the vessel's head as near the wind as possible, to let it drift astern, and thus, by this lubberly action, bore right upon the shore, carried on imperceptibly by a strong current.

At that moment the Englishman raised himself, and looking out before, vociferated, "A reef, a reef! Breakers a-head! Down with the helm! where the devil are you going?—Down with the helm, I say!" and rushing forward, he seized the tiller, but too late! Scarcely had he touched it with his hand, when with a tremendous shock the ship struck on the reef, making its very seams open, and its masts stagger. "Ho! down in the hold! down in the hold! heave all the ballast aft," cried Bradford; "lay those cannon here—bring her head to wind, let it take her aback if it will.—She may swing off yet."

But just then an immense swelling wave heaved the ship up like a cork, and dashed her down again upon the hidden rocks without hope or resource. Every one caught at what was next them for support; for the jar was so great, that it was hardly possible for even the sailors to keep upon their feet. But the next minute she became more steady, and a harsh grating sound succeeded, as if the hard angles of the rock were tearing the bottom of the ship to pieces. Every one now occupied himself in a different way. Bradford sat quietly down by the tiller, which he abandoned to its own guidance, while the Portugál ran whispering among his countrymen, who as speedily and silently as possible got the boat to the ship's side. In the meanwhile Dr. Wilbraham crept over to Lady Constance, who, turning her meek eyes to heaven, seemed to await her fate with patient resignation.

“ I need not ask you, my dear child,” said the good man, “ if you be prepared to go. Have you any thing to say to me, before we part ? soon I hope, to meet again where no storms come.”

“ But little,” answered Constance ; and according to the rite of her church, she whispered all the little faults that memory could supply, accusing herself of many things as sins, which few but herself would have held as even errors. When he had heard the lady’s confession, the clergyman turned to look for the waiting-woman to join her with her mistress in the consolations of religion ; but Mrs. Margaret, who greatly preferred the present to the future, was no longer there ; and looking forward, they beheld, that the Portuguese and Dutch had got out the boats, and were pouring in fast ; but that which most astonished them was to find, that the selfish waiting-woman had by some means got the very first place in the long-boat, from which the captain was striving to exclude two of the Englishmen, pushing off from the ship with the boat-hook. The lesser boat, however, was still near, and Dr. Wilbraham looked at Constance with an inquiring glance ; but Bradford, who had never stirred from his position, interposed, saying, “ Don’t go, lady—don’t go ! stick to the ship, she can’t sink, for the tide is near flood, and we are now aground, and it may be a while before she goes to pieces.—Those boats can never live through that surf. So don't go, lady! take my advice—and I'll manage to save you yet, if I can save myself.”

Even as he spoke, the two Englishmen made a desperate jump to leap into the lesser boat, which was pulling away after the other. One man fell too short, and sunk instantly; the other got hold of the gunwale, and strove to clamber in, but the boat was already too full, and a sea striking it at the moment, his weight put it out of trim, it shipped a heavy sea, settled for a moment, and sunk before their eyes.

It was a dreadful sight; and yet so deep, so exciting was the interest, that even after she had seen the whole ten persons sink, and some rise again, only to be overwhelmed by another wave, Constance could not take her eyes off the other boat, although she expected every moment to see it share the fate of its companion. Still, however, it rowed on.—The thunder had ceased, the wind was calmer, and the waves seemed less agitated.—There was

hope that it might reach the shore. At that moment it was hidden for an instant below a wave,—rose again—entered the surf—disappeared amidst the foam and spray—Constance looked to see it rise again, but it never was seen more, and in a few minutes she could distinguish a dark figure scramble out from the sea upon the shore, rise, fall again, lie for a moment as if exhausted, and then once more gaining its feet, run with all speed out of the way of the coming waves.

“ Oh dear, oh dear !” cried a dolorous voice from below. “ We shall all be drowned for a sure certainty—the water’s a coming in like mad,” and in a moment after, the head, and then the body, of honest Jekin Groby protruded itself from the hold, with strong signs and tokens, in his large thick eyelids, of having just woke from a profound sleep. “ Lord ’a mercy !” continued he, seeing the nearly empty deck. “ Where are all the folks ? Oh, Master Bradford, Master Bradford, we are in a bad way ! The water has just woke me out of my sleep.—What’s the meaning of that thumping. Lord 'a mercy! where's the Portingal?"

"Drowned!" answered Bradford calmly, "and every one of his crew, except Hinchin, the strong swimmer, who has got to land."

"Lord 'a mercy, only think!" cried Jekin. "Must I be drowned too? Hadn't I better jump over? I can swim a little too.—Shall I jump over, Master Bradford? Pray tell me, there's a good creature."

"No, no, stay where you are," replied Bradford. "Help me to lash this young lady to a spar. When the tide turns, which it will at four o'clock, that surf will go down, and the ship will keep together till then. Most likely Hinchin will send a boat before that to take us all off. If not, we can but trust to the water at last. However, let us be all ready."

Bradford now brought forth from the hold some rough planks, to one of which he lashed Lady Constance, who yielded herself to his guidance, only praying that he would do the same good turn to the clergyman, which he promised willingly. He then tied a small piece of wood across, to support her head, and fastened one of the heavy leathern bags to her feet, to raise her face above the water ; after which, as she was totally unable to move, he placed her in as easy a position as he could, and speaking a few frank words of comfort and assurance, he left her to perform the same office in favour of Dr. Wilbraham.

In the mean time, Jekin Groby had not forgotten himself, but willing to put his faith rather in the buoyancy of deal boards, than in his own powers of natation, had contrived to find a stout sort of packing-case, or wooden box, from which he knocked out both the top and bottom, and passing his feet through the rest, he raised it up till it reached his arm-pits, where he tied it securely ; and thus equipped in his wooden girdle, as he called it, he did not fear to trust himself to the waves.

All being now prepared, an hour or more of anxious expectation succeeded. Little was said by any one, and the tempest had ceased ; but the grinding sound of the ship, fretting upon the rock, still continued, and a sad creaking and groaning of the two masts that remained, seemed to announce their speedy fall. The wind had greatly subsided, but the air was heated and close, while the clouds overhead, still agitated by the past storm, every now and then came down in thick small rain. Towards four o'clock the tide turned, and as Bradford had prognosticated, the surf upon the shore gradually subsided, and the sea became more smooth, though yet agitated by a heavy swell, foaming into breakers along the whole line of reef on which the ship had struck. After looking out long, in the vain hope of seeing some boat coming to their assistance, Bradford approached Lady Constance, and addressing her, as indeed he had done throughout, with far more gentleness and consideration, than might have been expected from a man of his rough and turbulent character, "Lady," said he, "there seems to be no chance of a boat; the sea is now nearly smooth; I can't warrant that the ship will hold together all night, and we may have the storm back again. If you like to go now, I will get you safe to land, I am sure. I can't answer for it if you stay."

“ I will do as you think right,” said Lady Constance, with an involuntary shudder at the thought of trusting herself to the mercy of the waves. “ I will do as you think right; but pray take care of Dr. Wilbraham.”

“ No, no !” said the good chaplain, “ make the lady all your care.—I shall do well enough.”

“ Here, good fellow,” said Constance, taking a diamond of price from her finger; “ perhaps you may reach the shore without either of us, however, whether you do or not, take this jewel, as some recompense for your good service.”

The man took the ring, muttering that if he reached the shore, she should reach it too; and then, after giving some directions to Dr. Wilbraham in regard to rowing himself on towards the land, with his arms, which were free, he carried Lady Constance to the side of the vessel, that had now heeled almost to the water's edge. Returning for Dr. Wilbraham, with the assistance of Jekin he brought him also to the side; and then it became the question who should be the first to trust himself to the waves. Constance trembled violently, but said not a word, while Jekin Groby holding back, exclaimed, "Lord a' mercy ! I don't like it—at all like."

It was upon him, however, that Bradford fixed, crying, "Come, jump over, Jekey; there's no use of making mouths at it. I want you to help the clerk to steer—come, jump over!" and he laid his hand upon his shoulder.

"Well, well—I will, Master Bradford," cried Jekin, "don't ye touch me, and I will.—Oh dear, oh dear! it's mighty disagreeable—well, well, I will!" and bending his hams, he made as if he would have taken a vigorous leap; but his courage failed him, and he only made a sort of a hop of a few inches on the deck, without approaching any nearer to the water. Out of patience, Bradford caught him by the shoulder, and pushed him at once head-foremost into the water, from which he rose in a moment, all panting, buoyed up by the wooden case under his arms.

"Here, Jekey," cried Bradford, "take the Doctor's feet, as your arms are free;" and with the assistance of the worthy clothier, who bore no malice, he let down Dr. Wilbraham into the water, and returned to the lady.

As pale as death, Constance shut her eyes, and held her breath, while the rough sailor took her in his arms, and let her glide slowly into the water, which in a moment after she felt dashing round her uncontrolled. Opening her eyes, and panting for breath, she stretched out her arms, almost deprived of consciousness; but at that moment, Bradford jumped at once into the sea, and catching the board to which she was tied, put it in its right position, so that, though many a domineering wave would rise above its fellows, and dash its salt foam over her head, her mouth was generally elevated above the water sufficiently to allow her full room to breathe.

The distance of the ship from the land was about a quarter of a mile; but between it and the shore lay a variety of broken rocks, raising their rough heads above the waves, that dashed furiously amongst them, making a thousand struggling whirlpools and eddies round their sharp angles, as the retiring sea withdrew his unwilling waters from the strand. Constance, however, did not see all this, for her face being turned towards the sky, nothing met her sight but the changeable face of heaven, with the clouds hurrying over it, or the green billows on either side threatening every moment to overwhelm her. Often, often did her heart sink, and hard was it for the spirit of a timid girl, even supported by her firm trust in God's mercy, to keep the spark of hope alive within her bosom, while looking on the perils that surrounded her, and fancying a thousand that she did not behold.

Still the stout seaman swam beside her, piloting the little sort of raft he had made for her towards the shore, through all the difficulties of the navigation, which were not few or small; for the struggle between the retiring tide, and the impetus given by the wind, rendered almost every passage between the rocks a miniature Sylla and Charybdis.

At length, however, choosing a moment when the waves flowed fully in between two large rough stones, whose heads protruded most perpendicularly, he grasped the plank to which Constance was tied, with his left hand, and striking a few vigorous strokes with his right, soon placed her within the rocky screen, with which the coast was fenced, and within whose boundary the water was comparatively calm.

The first object that presented itself to his sight, within this haven, was the long-boat, keel upwards ; while, tossed by the waves upon one of the large flat stones that the ebbing tide had left half bare, appeared the corpse of the Portingal Captain, his feet and body on the rock, and his head dropping back, half covered by the water. In a minute after, the sailor's feet could touch the ground ; and gladly availing himself of the power to walk upon terra firma, he waded on, drawing the plank on which Constance lay after him, till reaching the dry land, he pulled her to the shore, cut the cord that tied her, and placed her on her feet.

Constance's first impulse was to throw herself on her knees, and to thank God for his great mercy ; her next to express her gratitude to the honest sailor, who weary and out of breath with his exertion, sat on a rock hard by ; but bewildered with all that had past, she could scarcely find words to speak, feeling herself in a world that seemed hardly her own, so far had she been on the brink of another. After a few confused sentences, she looked suddenly round, exclaiming, "Oh, where is Dr. Wilbraham?"

The sailor started up, and getting on the rock, looked out beyond, where about two hundred yards off, he perceived honest Jekin Groby, making his way towards the shore in one direction, while the plank to which the amiable clergyman was attached, was seen approaching the rocks in another, at a point where the waters were boiling with tenfold violence.

Constance's eye had already caught his long black habiliments, mingled with the white foam of the waves, and seeing that every fresh billow threatened to dash him to pieces against the stones, she clasped her hands in agony, and looked imploringly towards the sailor.

"He will have his brains dashed out, sure enough," said the man, watching him. "Zounds! he must be mad to try that—stay here, lady, I will see what can be done;" and rushing into the water, he waded as far as he could towards Dr. Wilbraham, and then once more began swimming.

Constance watched him with agonizing expectation, but before he reached the point, an angry wave swept round the good old man, and raising him high upon its top, dashed him violently against the rock. Constance shuddered, and clasping her hands over her eyes, strove to shut out the dreadful sight. In a few minutes she heard the voice of the sailor shouting to Jekin Groby, who had reached the shore, "Here, lend a hand!" and looking up she saw him drawing the clergyman to land, in the same manner that he had extricated herself.

Jekin Groby waded in to help him, and Constance flew to the spot which he approached; but the sight that presented itself made her blood run cold: Dr. Wilbraham was living indeed, but so dreadfully torn and bruised by beating against the rocks, that all hope seemed vain, and those who best loved him, might have regretted that he had not met with a speedier and more easy death.

Opening his exhausted eyes, he yet looked gladly upon the sweet girl that he had reared, like a young flower, from her early days to her full beauty, and who now hung tenderly over him. "Thank God, my dear child!" said he,

“ that you are safe—that is the first thing: for me, I am badly hurt, very badly hurt—but perhaps I may yet live—I could wish it, to see you happy—but if not, God’s will be done !”

Constance wept bitterly, and good Jekin Groby, infected with her sorrow, blubbered like a great baby.

“ There, leave off snivelling, you great fool,” cried Bradford, wiping something like a tear from his own rough cheek, “ and help me to carry the good gentleman to some cottage.” Thus saying, with the assistance of Jekin, he raised the old man, and followed by Constance, bore him on in search of an asylum.

CHAPTER IX.

“Thou seest me much distempered in my mind.”

DRYDEN.

WE have many reasons to believe, that men whose mental energies are of that rare quality which, for a time, seems to conquer fate and circumstance, and whether employed in good or evil deeds, to triumph over the common stumbling-blocks of their ordinary fellows—We have many reasons to believe, that such men, at the period when their prosperity has reached its foredoomed conclusion, are blessed or cursed, as it may be, with an intimation of their approaching end, and for the time lose that confident fearlessness which formerly bore them on to success.

Sir Payan Wileton had gone through life with fearless daring; calculating, but never hesitating; keensighted of danger, but never timid. From youth he had divested himself of the three great fears which generally affect mankind,—the fear of the world's opinion, the fear of his own conscience, and the fear of death, and thus endued with much bad courage, he had attempted and succeeded in many things which would have frightened a timid man, and failed with an irresolute one. And yet, as we have seen, by one of those strange contradictions of which human nature is full, Sir Payan, though an unbeliever in the bright truths of religion, was credulous to many of the darkest superstitions of the age in which he lived.

On such a mind, any thing that smacked of supernatural presentiment, was likely to take the firmest hold; and, on the morning after Lady Constance had, by his means and by his instigation, effected her flight from Richmond, he rose early from a troubled sleep, overshadowed by a deep despondency, which had never till then hung upon him. Before he was yet dressed, the news was brought him that one of his men had returned with the boat, and that the other had been arrested in the King's name. He felt that his fortune had passed away—an internal voice seemed to tell him that it was at an end ; but yet he omitted no measures of security, quitting the capital without loss of time, and leaving such instructions with the porter as he deemed most likely to blind the eyes of Wolsey ; hoping that the servant, whose life was in his power, would not betray him, yet prepared if he did, boldly to repel the charge, and by producing evidence to invalidate the other's testimony, to cast the accusation back upon his head.

But still, from that moment Sir Payan was an altered being ; and though many days passed by, without any thing occurring to disturb his repose ; though the King's progress towards Dover, without any notice having been taken of his participation in Lady Constance's escape, led him to believe that fear had kept the servant faithful, yet still Sir Payan remained in a state of gloom and lassitude, that raised many a marvel amongst those around him.

Wandering through the woods that surrounded his mansion, he passed hours and hours in deep, inactive, bitter meditation ; finding no consolation in his own heart, no hope in the future, and no repose in the past ; and, why he knew not, despairing where he had never despaired, trembling where he had never known fear.

Often he questioned himself upon the strange depression of his mind ; and the more he did so, the more he became convinced that it was a supernatural warning of approaching fate. Many were the resolutions that he made to shake it off, to struggle still, to seek the court, and urge his claim on the estates of Constance de Grey, as he would have done in former days ; but in vain ; a leaden power lay heavy upon his heart, and crushed all its usual energies ; and the only effort he could make, was to send out servants in every direction, to seek Sir Cesar the astrologer ; weakly hoping, to brace up his relaxed confidence by some predictions of success. But the old man was not easily to be found. No one knew his abode, and ever strange and erratic in his motions, he seemed now agitated by some extraordinary impulse, so that even when they had once found his track, the servants of Sir Payan had often to trace him to ten or twelve houses in the course of a day. Sometimes it was in the manor of the Peer, sometimes in the cottage of the peasant, that they heard of him ; but in none did he seem to sojourn for above an hour, hurrying on wildly to the dwelling of some other, amongst the many that he knew in all classes.

At length they overtook him, in the road near Sandgate, and delivered Sir Payan's message ; whereupon, without any reply, he turned his horse and rode towards Chilham, where he arrived in the evening. Springing to the ground without an appearance of fatigue, the old man sought Sir Payan in the park, to which the servants said he had retired ; and winding through the various long alleys, found him at length walking backwards and forwards, with his arms crossed on his bosom, and his eyes fixed upon the ground. The evening sunshine was streaming brightly upon the spot, pouring a mellow misty light through the western trees, on the tall dark figure of Sir Payan ; who, bending down his head, paced along with gloomy slowness, like some bad spirit, oppressed and tormented by the very smile of heaven.

It was a strange sight to see his meeting with Sir Cesar ; both were pale and haggard ; for some cause, only known to himself, had worn the keen features of the astrologer, till the bones and cartilages seemed starting through the skin ; and Sir Payan's ashy cheek had lately acquired a still more deadly hue than it usually bore ; both too looked wild and fearful ; the keen black eyes of the old man showing with a terrific brightness, in his thin and livid face, and the stern features of Sir Payan appearing full of a sort of ferocious light, which his attendants had remarked, ever since he had been overthrown in the tilt by the lance of Sir Osborne. Meeting thus, in the full yellow sunshine, while Sir Cesar fixed his usual intense and scrutinizing glance upon the countenance of the other, and Sir Payan strove to receive him with a smile, that but mocked the lips it shone upon ; they looked like two beings of another world, met for the first time in upper air, to commune of things long past.

“Well, unhappy man,” said Sir Cesar at length, “what seekest thou with me?”

“That I am unhappy,” replied Sir Payan, knitting his brow, as he saw that little consolation was to be expected from the astrologer, “I do not deny ; and it is to know why I am unhappy, that I have asked you to come hither.”

“You are unhappy,” answered Sir Cesar, “because you have plundered the widow and the orphan, because you have wronged the friendless and the weak, because you have betrayed the confident and the generous.— You are unhappy, because there is not one in the wide world that loves you, and because you even despise, and hate, and reprobate yourself.”

“Old man ! old man !” cried Sir Payan, half unsheathing his dagger, “beware, beware. Those men,” he added, pushing back the weapon into its sheath, “ought only to be unhappy that are unsuccessful,—the rest is all a bugbear, set up by the weak to frighten away the strong. But I have been successful—am successful. Why then am I unhappy ?”

“Because your success is at an end,” replied the astrologer ; “because you tremble on your fall,—because your days are numbered, and late remorse is gnawing your heart in spite of your vain-boasting. Nay, lay not your hand upon the hilt of your dagger ! Over me, murderer ! you have no power. That dagger took the life of one that had never wronged you. Remember the route at

Taunton—remember the youth, murdered the night after he surrendered !”—Sir Payan trembled like an aspen leaf while the old man spoke.—“ Yes, murderer !” continued Sir Cesar, “ though you thought the deed hid in the bowels of the earth, I know it all. That hand slew all that was dearest to me on earth !—the child that unhappy fortune forced me to leave upon this cursed shore; and long, long ago should his fate have been avenged in your blood, had not I seen—had not I known, that Heaven willed it otherwise. I have waited patiently for the hour that is now come—I have broken your bread, and I have drank of your wine ; but while I did so, I have seen you gathering curses on your head, and accumulating sins to sink you to perdition, and that has taught me to endure. I would not have saved you one hour of crime—I would not have robbed my revenge of one single sin—no, not for an empire ! But I have watched you ; go on, gloriously, triumphantly, in evil and in wickedness, till heaven can bear no more—till you have eaten up your future, and soon, with all your crimes upon your head, hated, despised, condemned by all mankind, your black soul shall be parted from your body, and my eyes shall see you die.”

Sir Payan had listened with varied emotions as the old man spoke. Surprise, remorse, and fear had been the first; but gradually, the more tempestuous feelings of his nature hurried away the rest, and rage gaining mastery of all, he drew his poniard, and sprang upon Sir Cesar. But in the very act, as his arm was raised to strike, he was caught by two powerful men, who threw him back upon the ground, and disarmed him; one of them exclaiming, “Ho, ho! we have just come in time.—Sir Payan Wileton, you are attached in the King’s name—Lo, here is the warrant for your apprehension. You must come with us, Sir, to Calais.”

One would attempt, in vain, to describe the rage that convulsed the form of Sir Payan Wileton, more especially when he beheld Sir Cesar smile upon him with a look of triumphant satisfaction. “Seize him!” exclaimed he, with furious violence, pointing to the astrologer; “seize him! if you love your King and your country. He is a marked and obnoxious traitor. I impeach him, and you do not your duty if you let him escape; or are you his confederates, and come up to prevent my punishing him for the treasons he has just acknowledged."

"Sir Payan Wileton," replied the sergeant-at-arms, "this passion is all in vain. I am sent here with a warrant from the King's privy council, to attach you for high treason; but I have no authority to arrest any one else."

"But I am a magistrate," cried the baffled Knight; "let him not escape, I enjoin you, till I have time to commit him. He is a traitor, I say, and if you seize him not, you are the King's enemies."

"Attached for high treason, Sir, you are no longer a magistrate," replied the sergeant. "At all events, I do not hold myself justified in apprehending any body against whom I have no warrant, especially when I found you raising your hand illegally against the person's life whom you now accuse. I can take no heed of the matter—you must come with me."

"He shall be satisfied," said Sir Cesar. "Venomless serpent! I will follow thee now till thy last hour. But think not that thou canst hurt me, for thy power has gone from thee; and though wicked as a demon, thou art weak as a child.—I know that my days are numbered as well as thine.—I know that we are doomed to pass the same gate; but not to journey on the same road. Lead on, sergeant, I will journey on with you; and then if this bad man have ought to urge against me, let him do it.”

“Go, if you will, Sir,” replied the officer; “but remember, you act according to your own pleasure—I make no arrest in your case—you are free to come with us or to stay, as you think fit.”

Sir Payan was now led back to the house, which was in possession of the King’s archers; and as he passed through his own hall, with a burning heart, the hasty glance that he cast around amongst his servants, showed him at once, that though there were none to pity or befriend, there were many full ready to betray:—then rushed upon his mind, the many accusations that they might pile upon his head, now that they saw him sinking below the stream.—

The certainty of death—the dread of something after death—doubts of his own scepticism—the innate, all-powerful conviction of a future state—a state growing dreadfully perceptible to his eye as he approached the brink of that yawning gulf, which his own acts had peopled with strange fears. All that he had scoffed at, all that he had despised, now assumed a new and fearful character—even the world’s opinion—the world’s contemned opinion, came across his thought—that there was not one heart on all the earth would mourn his end; that hatred and abhorrence would go with him to the grave, and that his memory would only live with infamy in the records of crime and punishment. Burying his face in his hands, he sat in deep, despairing, agonizing silence, while his horse was being prepared, and while the officer put his seal upon the various doors which he thought it necessary to secure.

To the questions of whether he needed any refreshment, or required any thing but the clothes which had been prepared, before he quitted the house, he replied nothing, but with glaring eyes waved his hand, signifying that he was ready to proceed.

A few hours brought the whole party to Dover, and the next day saw their arrival at Calais; but, by that time, the Court had removed to Guisnes, and the sergeant having no orders to bring his prisoner farther, sent forward a messenger to announce his arrival, and demand instructions.

CHAPTER X.

“ Once more the fleeting soul came back,
T’ inspire the mortal frame,
And in the body took a doubtful stand,
Hovering like expiring flame
That mounts and falls by turns.”

DRYDEN.

THE painful situation of Lady Constance de Grey had not lost any portion of its sorrow, or gained any ray of hope on the first of June, three days after we last left her, at which period we again take her story up. She was then sitting in a small, poor cottage between Whitesand Bay and Boulogne, watching the slumber of the excellent old man whose regard for her had brought upon his head so much pain and danger. Ever since he had been removed to the hut where they now were, he had lingered in great agony, except at those times when a state of stupor fell upon him, under which he would remain for many hours, and only wake from it again to acute pain. He had, however, that morning, fulfilled the last duties of his religion, with the assistance of a good monk of Boulogne, who now sat with Lady Constance, watching the sweet sleep into which he had fallen, for the first time since their shipwreck.

Across the little window, to keep out the light, Constance had drawn one of her own dresses, which had been saved by the sailor Bradford having tied the leathern case that contained them, to the plank which had brought herself to shore ; but still through the casement, notwithstanding this sort of extemporaneous curtain, the soft breath of the early morning flowed in ; and the murmuring voice of the treacherous ocean, was heard softly from afar, filling up every pause in the singing of the birds, and the busy hum of all the light children of the summer.

The calmness of the old man's slumber gave Constance hope ; and, with a sweet smile, she sat beside him listening to the mingled voice of creation, and joining mentally in the song of praise, that all things seemed raising towards the great Creator. Indeed, if ever mortal being might be supposed to resemble those pure spirits, who, freed from all touch of clay, adore the Almighty in his works, she then looked like an angel, in form, in feature, and in expression, while robed all in white, and watching the sick bed of her ancient friend, she looked upon his tranquil slumber, with that bland smile of hope and gratitude.

In the mean while the old monk sat on the other side of his bed, regarding him with more anxiety ; for long experience, in visiting those who hung upon the brink of another world, had taught him, that sleep like that into which the clergyman had fallen, as often preceded death as recovery. It had continued thus till towards midday, the cottage being left in solitude and silence, for the sailor, Bradford, had gone to seek remedies from a simpler at Boulogne ; and Jekin Groby had stolen away for a visit to Calais, while the people to whom the cotttage belonged, were absent upon their daily occupations. At length, however, a slight sort of convulsive motion passed over the features of the old man, and opening his eyes, he said in a faint, low voice, "Constance, my dear child, where are you? My eyes are dim."

"I am here, my dear Sir," replied Constance. "You have been sleeping very sweetly. I hope you feel better."

"It is over, Constance!" replied Dr. Wilbraham, calmly but feebly. "I am dying, my child. Let me see the sunshine." Constance withdrew the curtain, and the fresh air blowing on the sick man's face seemed to give him more strength. "It is bright," cried he, "it is very bright. I feel the sweet summer air, and I hear the glad singing of the birds; but I go fast, dear daughter, where there are things brighter and sweeter,—for surely, surely, God who has clothed this world with such splendour, has reserved far greater for the world to come."

The tears streamed down Constance's cheeks, for there was in the old man's face a look of death not to be mistaken—that look the inevitable precursor of dissolution to man, when it seems as if the avenging angel had come between him and the sun of being, and cast his dark shadow over him for ever.

“ Weep not, Constance,” said the old man, with faint and broken efforts, “ for no storms will reach me in my Redeemer’s bosom.—In his mercy is my hope, in his salvation is my reliance. Soon, soon shall I be in the place of peace where joy reigneth eternally—Could I have a fear, my dear child, it would be for you, left alone in a wide and desolate world, with none to protect you.—But no, I have no fear ! God is your protector ! and never, never, my child, doubt his goodness, nor think that he does not as surely watch over the universe, as he created it at first. Every thing is beneath his eye, from the smallest grain of sand to the great globe itself, and his will governs all, and guides all, though we neither see the beginning nor the end.—Constance, I am departing,” he continued more faintly—“ God’s blessing be upon you, my child ! and oh ! if He in his wisdom ever permits the spirit of the dead, to watch over those they loved when living, I will be with you and Darnley—when this frail body —is dust.”

His lips began gradually to lose their power of utterance, and his head fell back upon the pillow. The monk saw that the good man's end was approaching fast, and placing the crucifix in his dying hand, he poured the words of consolation in his ear, but Dr. Wilbraham slightly motioned with his hand, to signify that he was quite prepared, and fixing his eyes upon the cross, murmured to himself, "I come, oh Lord, I come! Be thou merciful unto me, oh King of mercy! Deliver speedily from the power of death, oh Lord of life!"

The sounds gradually ceased, but yet his lips continued to move—his lips lost their motion; but still his eyes fixed full of hope upon the cross—A film came over them—it passed away, and the light beamed up again—shone brightly for a moment—waned—vanished—and all was death. The eyes were still fixed upon the cross, but that bright thing, life, was there no more.—To look at them, no one could say what was gone between that minute and the one before; and yet it was evident, that they were now but dust—the light was extinguished, the wine was poured out, and it was but the broken lamp, the empty urn, that remained to go down into the tomb.

Constance closed his eyes, and weeping bitterly, kneeled down with the old monk, and joined in the prayer that he addressed to heaven. She then rose, and seated herself by all that remained of her dead friend, feeling alone in all the world, solitary, friendless, desolate; and straining her sweet eyes upon the cold unresponsive countenance of the dead, she seemed bitterly to drink to the dregs, the cup of hopelessness which that sight offered.

No one spake,—the monk too was silent, seeming to think that the prayer he had offered to the Deity was the only fitting language for the presence of the dead, when a sound was heard without, and the door gently opening admitted the form of Jekin Groby. The good clothier thought the old man still slept, as when he had left the cottage, and advanced on tiptoe for fear of waking him; but the lifted hand of the monk, the streaming eyes of Constance, and the cold rigid stiffness of the face before him, warned him of what had happened; and pausing suddenly, he clasped his hands with a look of unaffected sorrow. "Good God!" cried he, "he is dead! Alas the day!"—Constance's tears streamed afresh—"Lady," said the worthy man, in a kindly tone, "take comfort! He is gone to a better place than we have here, poor hapless souls! And surely, if all were as well fitted for that place as he was, we should have little cause to fear our death, and our gossips little cause to weep. Take comfort, sweet lady! take comfort! Our God is too good, for us to murmur when he cuts our measure short."

There was something in the homely consolation of the honest Englishman, that touched Constance to the heart, and yet she could not refrain from weeping even more than before.

"Nay, nay, dear lady," continued Jekin, affected almost to tears himself, "you must come away from here; I cannot bear to see you weep so; and though I am but a poor clothier, and little fitted to put myself in his place that is gone, I will never leave you till I see you safe. Indeed I won't! Come, lady, into the other cottage hard by, and we will send some one to watch here in your place. Lord, Lord ! to think how soon a fellow-creature is gone ! Sure I thought to find him better when I came back.—Come, lady, come.”

“ Perhaps I had better,” replied Constance, drying her tears. “ My cares for him now are useless ; yet, though I murmur not at God’s will, I must e’en weep, for I have lost as good a friend, and the world has lost as good a man, as ever it possessed. But I will go ; for it is in vain to stay here and encourage unavailing grief.” She then addressed a few sentences to the monk in French, thanking him for his charitable offices towards her dead friend, and begging him to remain there till she could send some one to watch the body, adding, that if he would come after that, to the adjoining cottage, she would beg him to convey to his convent a small gift on her part.

The monk bowed his head, and promised to obey ; and Constance, giving one last look to the inanimate form of the excellent being she had just lost, followed Jekin Groby to the cottage hard by, where, begging to be left alone, she once more burst into tears, and let both her sorrow and despondency have way, feeling that sort of oppression at her heart, which can but be relieved by weeping.

It is needless to follow farther such sad scenes, to tell the blunt grief of Bradford, when he returned and found that his errand had been in vain ; or to describe the funeral of good Dr. Wilbraham, which took place the next day (for so custom required) in the little cemetery of Whitesand Bay.

Immediately this was over, Lady Constance prepared to set out for Boulogne, hoping to find a refuge in the heart of France, till she had time to consider and execute some plan for her future conduct. We have twice said, that the sailor, in tying her to the plank on which she had floated from the shipwrecked vessel, had fastened to the end of the board nearest her feet, one of her own leathern cases, for the purpose of keeping her head raised above the water ; and in this, as it luckily happened, were all the jewels, and the money which she had brought with her from London.

It would doubtless have rendered her situation much more critical and interesting, if she had been deprived of all such resource ; but as the fact was so, it is necessary to state it. No difficulty therefore seemed likely to present itself in her journey to her own estates, except that which might arise, in procuring a litter to convey her on her way ; or in meeting with some female attendant, willing to accompany her. The latter of these was soon done away with, for the daughter of the cottagers where she had lodged, a gay, good-humoured Picarde, gladly undertook the post of waiting-woman to the sweet lady, whose gentleness had won them all, and Bradford, who, from a soldier, a sailor, a shipwright, and a Rochester rioter, had now become a squire of dames, was dispatched to Boulogne, to see if he could buy or hire a litter and horses.

In the midst of all these proceedings, poor Jekin Groby was sadly agitated by many contending feelings. In his first fit of sympathy with Constance, on the death of Dr. Wilbraham, he had, as we have seen, promised to accompany her to the end of her journey, whithersoever it might be ; but the thoughts of dear little England, and his own fire-side, and his bales of cloth, and his bags of angels, called him vehemently across the Channel, while curiosity, with a certain touch of mercantile calculation, pulled him strongly towards the court at Calais. Notwithstanding, he resolved, above all things, to act handsomely, as he said, towards the lady; and accordingly he accompanied Bradford to Boulogne, to ascertain if he could by any way get off trudging after her the Lord knows where, as he expressed it, though he vowed he was very willing to go, if he could be of any service.

After the sailor and his companion had been absent about six hours, Constance began to be impatient, and proceeded to the door of the cottage to see if she could perceive them coming. Gazing for a few minutes on the road to Boulogne, she beheld, rising above the brow of the hill before her, a knight's pennon, and presently half a dozen spears appeared bristling up behind it. Judging that it was some accidental party proceeding towards Whitesand Bay, Constance retired into the cottage, and was not a little surprised when she heard the horses halt before the door. In a moment after, a gallant cavalier, in peaceful guise, armed only with his sword and dagger, entered the hut, and, doffing his plumed mortier to the lady, with a low inclination of the head, he advanced towards her, saying in French, "Have I the honour of speaking to the noble Lady de Grey, Countess of Boissy and the Val de Marne?"

"The same, Sir Knight," replied the lady. "To what, may I ask, do I owe the honour of your presence?"

"His Highness, Francis King of France, now in the city of Boulogne," replied the Knight, "hearing that a lady, and his vassal, though born an English subject, had been shipwrecked on this shore, has chosen me for the pleasing task of inviting, in his name, the Countess de Boissy, to repair to his royal court, not as a sovereign commanding the homage of his vassal, but as a gracious and a noble friend, offering service and goodwill. His Highness' sister also, the Princess Marguerite of Alençon, has sent her own litter for your convenience, with such escort as may suit your quality."

Constance could only express her thanks. Had she possessed the power of choice, she would of course have preferred a thousand times to have retired to the Val de Marne, without her coming being known to the French King, or his court, till such time, at least, as the meeting between him and the King of England had taken place. However, as it was known, she could not refuse to obey, and she signified her readiness to accompany the French Knight, begging him merely to wait till the return of a person she had sent to Boulogne for a litter.

“He will not return, Lady,” replied the Chevalier; “it was through his search for a litter at Boulogne, where none are to be had, all being bought for the Court’s progress to Ardres, that his Highness became acquainted with your arrival within his kingdom.”

The Knight was proceeding to inform her of the circumstances which had occurred, when the quick sound of horses’ feet was heard without, joined to the clanging of arms, the jingling of spurs and trappings, and various rough cries in the English tongue.

“Have her! but I will have her, by the Lord!” cried a voice near the door; and in a moment after, a Knight, armed at all points, strode into the cottage. "How now! How now!" cried he; "what is all this? Ah, Monsieur de Bussy," he continued, changing his language to broken abominable French, "what are you doing with this lady?"

"I come, Sir John Hardacre," answered the Frenchman, "to invite her to the Court of Francis of France, whose vassal the lady is."

"And I come," replied the Englishman, "to claim her for Henry King of England, whose born subject she is, and ward of the crown; and so I will have her, and carry her to Guisnes, as I am commanded."

"That depends upon circumstances, Sir," answered the Frenchman, offended at the tone of the other. "You are Governor of Calais, but you do not command here. You are off the English pale, Sir; and I say that without the lady goes with you willingly, and by preference, you shall not take her."

"I shall not!" exclaimed the Englishman. "Who the devil shall stop me?"

"That will I," answered the French Knight; "and I tell you so to your beard."

The Englishman laid his hand upon his sword, and the Frenchman was not slack to follow his example; but Constance interposed. "Hold, hold! gentlemen," cried she; "I am not worthy of such contention. Monsieur de Bussy, favour me by offering every expression of my humble duty to his Highness, your noble King; and show him that I intended instantly to have obeyed his commands, and followed you to his court, but that I am compelled, against my will, to do otherwise.—Sir John Hardacre, I am ready to accompany you."

"If such be your will, fair lady," replied the French Knight, "I have nothing but to execute your charge. However, I must repeat, that without your full consent, you shall not be taken from French ground, or I am no true Knight."

An angry replication trembled on the lip of the English Captain, but Constance stopped its utterance, by once more declaring her willingness to go; and the French officer bowing low, thrust back his sword into the sheath, and left the cottage somewhat out of humour with the event of his expedition.

When he and his followers had ridden away, Sir John Hardacre called up a lady's horse, which one of his men-at-arms led by the bridle; and after permitting Constance to make some change of her apparel, and to pay the good folks of the cottage for her entertainment, he placed her in the saddle, and holding the bridle himself, led her away at a quick pace towards Guisnes. He was a rough old soldier, somewhat hardened by long military service, but the beauty and gentleness of his fair prisoner (for such indeed may we consider poor Constance to have been,) somewhat softened his acerbity; and after riding on for near an hour in silence, during which he revolved at least twenty ways of addressing the lady, without pleasing himself with any, he began by a somewhat bungling excuse, both for his errand and his manner of executing it.

“I suppose, Sir,” replied Constance, coldly, “that you have done your duty. Whether you have done it harshly or not, is for you to consider.”

This quite put a stop to all the Knight's intentions of conversation, and did not particularly soothe his humour; so that for many miles along the road he failed not every moment to turn round his head, and vent his spleen upon his men in various high-seasoned curses, for faults which they might or might not have committed, as the case happened; the Knight's powers of objurgation not only extending to the cursing itself, but also to supplying the cause.

It was nearly seven o'clock when they began to approach the little town of Guisnes, but at that season of the year the full light of day was still shining upon all the objects round about; and Constance might perceive, as they rode up, all the bustle and crowding, and idle activity caused by the arrival of the Court.

Her heart sunk when she saw it, and thought of all she might then have to endure. Under any other circumstances, however, it would have been a gay and a pleasing sight,—so full of life and activity, glitter, and show, was every thing that met the eye.

To the southward of the town of Guisnes, upon the large open green that extended on the outside of the walls, was to be seen a multitude of tents, of all kinds and colours, with a multitude of busy human beings, employed in raising fresh pavilions on every open space, or in decorating those already spread, with streamers, pennons and banners of all the bright hues under the sun. Long lines of horses and mules loaded with armour or baggage, and ornamented with gay ribbons to put them in harmony with the scene, were winding about all over the plain, some proceeding towards the town, some seeking the tents of their several lords, while, mingled amongst them, appeared various bands of soldiers, on horseback and on foot, with the rays of the declining sun catching upon the heads of their bills and lances; and together with the white cassock and broad red cross, marking them out from all the other objects. Here and there too, might be seen a party of knights and gentlemen cantering over the plain, and enjoying the bustle of the scene, or standing in separate groups, issuing their orders for the erection and garnishing of their tents; while couriers, and pursuivants, and heralds, in all their gay dresses, mingled with mule drivers, lacqueys, and peasants, armourers,

Behind, lay the town of Guisnes, with the forest at its back; and a good deal nearer, the castle, with its protecting guns pointed over the plain: but the most striking object, and that which instantly caught the eye, was a building raised immediately in front of the citadel, on which all that art could devise, or riches could procure, had been lavished, to render it a palace fit for the luxurious King, who was about to make it his temporary residence.

From the distance at which they were, when it first struck her sight, Constance could only perceive that it was a vast and splendid edifice, apparently square, and seeming to offer a facade of about four hundred feet on every side, while the sun, catching on the gilding, with which it was covered, and the immense quantity of glass that it contained, rendered it like some great ornament of gold, enriched with brilliants.

Although her heart was sad, and nothing that she saw tended to dispel its gloom, she could not refrain from gazing round with a half-curious, half-anxious glance upon all the gay objects that surrounded her; almost fearing to be recognised by some one that had known her at the court, now that she was led along as a kind of prisoner,—a single woman, amidst a band of rude soldiers. Sir John Hardacre, however, spurred on towards the bridge, which was nearly impassable, by the number of beasts of burden and their drivers by which it was covered; and standing but on a little ceremony with his fellow lieges, he dashed through the midst of them all, cursing one, and striking another, and overturning a third, much to Constance's horror and dismay. Having reached the other side, and created by his haste as much confusion and discomfort as he could in his passage, the surly captain slackened his pace, muttering something about dignity, and turned his rein towards the temporary palace of the King. Proceeding slowly amidst a multitude, many of whom had seen her before, and whose remark she was very willing to escape, Constance's only resource was to fix her eyes upon the palace, and to busy herself in the contemplation of its splendour.

Raised upon a high platform, it was not only visible from every part of the plain, but itself commanded a view of the whole gay scene below, with its tents and its multitudes, standing as a sort of nucleus to all the magnificence around.

Before the gate, to which Sir John Hardacre took his way, and which was itself a massy arch, flanked by two towers raised upon the platform, there stood two objects not unworthy of remark, as exemplifying the tastes of the day: the one was a magnificent fountain, richly wrought with arches and arabesques, painted in fine gold and blue, supporting a figure of Bacchus crowned with vine leaves, over whose head appeared inscribed, in letters of gold, "Faites bonne chère qui voudra." No unmeaning invitation, for the fountain below ceased not to pour forth three streams of various coloured wines, supplied by reservoirs in the interior of the palace. On the other side of the gate, was seen four golden lions supporting a pillar of bronze, round the shaft of which twined up various gilt wreaths, interlaced together; while on the summit stood a statue of Venus's "purblind son and heir," pointing his arrows at those who approached the gate.

Nevertheless, it was not on the charmed cup of the one, or the bended bow of the other chicken deity, that the battlemented arch above mentioned, relied for defence; for in the several windows, were placed gigantic figures of men in armour, apparently in the act of hurling down enormous rocks upon the head of whatever venturous stranger should attempt to pass the prescribed bound. At the same time appeared round about, various goodly paintings of the demigods of story; the Hercules's, the Theseus's, the Alexanders, fabulous and historical; while, showing strangely enough in such company, many a fat porter and yeoman of the lodge loitered about in rich liveries, as familiar with the gods and goddesses, as if they had been born upon Olympus, and swaddled in Tempé.

At the flight of steps which led to this gate, Sir John Hardacre dismounted, and lifting Lady Constance from her horse, passed on into the inner court of the palace, which would indeed have been not only splendid but elegant, had it not been for a few instances of the same refined taste, which we have just noticed. The four inner faces of the building were perfectly regular, consisting of two stories, the lower one of which was almost entirely of glass, formed into plain and bow windows alternately, separated from each other by a slight column of gold, and surrounded by a multitude of arabesques and garlands. Exactly opposite to the gate appeared a vestibule, thrown a little forward from the building, and surmounted by four large bow windows, supported on trimmers, the corbels of which represented a thousand strange gilt faces, looking out from a screen of olive branches, cast in lead and painted green; while various tall statues in silver armour, were ranged on each side, as guards to the entrance.

It was towards this sort of hall, that Sir John Hardacre led poor Constance de Grey, to whose heart all the gaiety and splendour of the scene seemed but to communicate a more chilling sensation of friendless loneliness; while the very gaze and whispering of the royal servants, who had all known of her flight, and now witnessed her return, made the quick blood mount into her beautiful cheek, as she was hurried along by the brutal soldier, without any regard to her feelings, or compassion for her fears.

“You must wait here, Mistress Constance,” said he, having led her into the vestibule, which was full of yeomen and grooms, “while I go and tell the right reverend Father Lord Cardinal, that I have brought you.”

“Here !” exclaimed Constance, casting her eyes round, “surely you do not mean me to wait here, amongst the servants ?”

“Why, where would you go ?” demanded he roughly, “I’ve no other place to put you.— Wait here, wait here, and mind you don’t run away again.”

Constance could support no more, and covering her face with her hands, she burst into a violent flood of tears. At that moment a voice that she knew, struck her ears,—“This to my cousin, Sir !” exclaimed Lord Darby, who had heard what passed as he descended a flight of stairs which led away to the left, “this to my cousin, Sir John Hardacre ! You would do better to jump off the donjon of Rochester Castle, than to leave her here with lacqueys and footboys.”

“And why should I not,” demanded the soldier, his eyes flashing fire. “Mind your own affairs my Lord Darby, and let me mind mine.”

“You are an unfeeling old villain, Sir,” answered the Earl, passing him and taking Constance by the hand. “Yes, Sir! stare your fill! I say you are an unfeeling villain, and neither knight nor gentleman.”

The soldier laid his hand upon his sword and drew it half out of its sheath. “Knock him down! knock him down!” cried a dozen voices. “The precincts of the court! out with him! Have his hand off!” Sir John Hardacre thrust his weapon back into the sheath, gazing however grimly round, as if he would fain have used it upon some one.

“Your brutal violence Sir,” said Lord Darby, “will bring upon you, if you heed not, a worse punishment than I can inflict; yet you will not find me in a proper place, unwilling to give you a lesson on what is due to a lady. Come, Constance, I will lead you to her Highness, where you will meet, I am sure, a kind reception. You, Sir, do your errand to my Lord Cardinal, who shall be informed by me of your noble and knightly treatment of the Lady de Grey."

Thus saying, he led Constance through a long corridor to an antichamber, wherein stood two of the Queen's pages. Here Lord Darby paused, and sent one of the attendants to request an audience, taking the opportunity of the time they waited, to soothe the mind of his fair cousin by informing her of all that had passed in her absence, and assuring her that the Queen had ever been her warmest defender.

All the news that he gave her, of course took a heavy weight from Constance's mind; and drying her eyes, she congratulated him gladly on his approaching marriage, and would fain—very fain, have asked if he could give her any such consolatory information in regard to Darnley, but the Earl had never once mentioned his name, and she knew not how to begin the subject herself. While considering, and hesitating, whether to ask boldly or not, the Queen's page returned and ushered them to her presence. Constance was still much agitated, and even the kind and dignified sweetness, the motherly tenderness with which Kathrine received her, a tenderness which she had not known for so long, overcame her, and she wept as much as if she had been most unhappy.

The Queen understood it all, and sending Lord Darby away, she soon won Constance to her usual placid mood, and then questioning her of all the dangers and sorrows she had undergone, she gave her the best of all balms, sympathy ; trembling at her account of the shipwreck, and melted even to tears by the death of the good clergyman.

CHAPTER XI.

“ Men might say
Till this time pomp was single, but now married
To one above itself.”

MANY were the anxious eyes turned towards the sky on the morning of the seventh of June, the day appointed for the meeting of the two Kings of France and England; for some inauspicious clouds had ushered in the dawn, and several of those persons who take a delight in prognosticating evil, whenever they can find occasion,—who enjoy mingling the sour with whatever is sweet in life; in short, the lemon-squeezers of society had taken care to affirm, that they had felt several drops of rain, and to prophecy that it would pour before night. To put their vaticination out of joint, however, the jolly summer sun came like a cleanly housemaid, towards eight o'clock, and with his broom of rays, swept all the dirty clouds from the floor of heaven. By this time the bustle of preparation had begun at the town of Guisnes. All was in activity amongst the tents, and many a lord and gentleman was already on his horse, arraying his men in order of battle, under the walls of the castle, from the gates of which presently issued forth the archer-guard of the King of England, and took the front of the array. Not long after, Lord Essex, the Earl Marshal, appeared on the plain, and riding along the line of foot, gave the strictest orders to the various officers for maintaining regularity and tranquillity through the day; well knowing that the excited hilarity of such occasions often creates more serious evils than infinitely worse feelings. Another cause, however, seemed likely to have interrupted the general good-humour; for, in the midst of his injunctions to maintain order and propriety of demeanour towards their French allies, an officer was seen spurring at full speed from the side of Ardres, and as he rode up, it was very evident, by his countenance, that the good Captain, Richard Gibson, was not the best pleased man in the world. All eyes were turned upon him, and a dead silence ensued amidst the archers, while the Earl demanded, "Why, how now, Gibson, what is the matter?"

"So please you, my Lord," replied the officer, "the four pennons of white and green, which, by your command, I set up on the edge of the hill, above the valley of Andern, have been vilely thrown down by the French Lord Chatillon, who says, that as the French have none on the other hill, he wills not that we have any either."

A loud murmuring made itself heard at this news amongst the footmen; and one of the young gallants, riding near the Earl, put spurs to his horse, as if to ride away to the scene of the dispute.

"Silence!" cried the Earl, over whose cheek also an angry flush had passed at first, but who speedily recovered his temper. "Brian, come back, come back, I say, Sir, let not a man stir!"

"What, must we stand tamely, and be insulted by the French?" cried the youth, unwillingly reining in his horse.

“ They do not insult us, Sir,” replied Lord Essex, wisely determined not to let any trifling punctilio disturb the harmony of the meeting, yet knowing how difficult it is to rule John Bull from his surly humour. “ They do not insult us. The pennons were set up for their convenience, to show them the place of meeting, which is within the English pale. If they choose to be such fools, as to risk missing the way, and go a mile round, why let them ; we shall but laugh at them when they come.”

“ The matter thus turned off,” he whispered a few words to Gibson, and sending him back to the vale of Andern, proceeded, with the aid of heralds and other officers of arms, to arrange all the ceremonies of the march. However, various were the reports that spread amongst the people, concerning the intentions of the French, some declaring openly, that they believed they intended to surround the field with a great force, and take the King of England prisoner. Others shook the wise head, and implied much more than they ventured to say ; and many a poor rogue, amongst those who “ talk of court news as if they were God’s spies," pretended that they had been with the French power, and heard all about it; so that they would tell you, the very cunning of the thing, and its fashion, and when it was to be.

While rumour was thus exercising her hundred tongues, and, as usual, lying with them all, the warning gun was fired from the castle of Guisnes, giving notice that the King of England was ready to set out, and all hurried to place themselves in order. In a few minutes the distant roar of another large piece of artillery was heard from Ardres, answering the first; and for the five minutes before the procession was formed, like the five minutes of tuning before a concert, all was noise, clamour, and confusion.—The sounding of the trumpets to horse, the shouts of the various leaders, the loud cries of the marshals and heralds, and the roaring of the artillery from the castle, as the King put his foot in the stirrup, all combined to make one general outcry rarely equalled.

Gradually the tumult subsided — gradually also the confused assemblage assumed a regular form. Flags, and pennons, and banderols, embroidered banners, and scutcheons; silver pillars, and crosses, and crooks, ranged themselves in long line, and the bright procession, an interminable stream of living gold, began to wind across the plain. First came about five hundred of the gayest and wealthiest gentlemen of England, below the rank of baron; squires, knights, and bannerets, rivalling each other in the richness of their apparel, and the beauty of their horses; while the pennons of the knights fluttered above their heads, marking the place of the English chivalry; next appeared the proud barons of the realm, each with his banner borne before him, and followed by a custrel with the shield of his arms. To these again succeeded the bishops, not in the simple robes of the Protestant clergy, but in the more gorgeous habits of the Church of Rome; while close upon their steps, rode the higher nobility, surrounding the immediate person of the King, and offering the most splendid mass of gold and jewels that the summer sun ever shone upon.

Slowly the procession moved forward, to allow the line of those on foot to keep an equal pace. Nor did this band offer a less gay and pleasing sight than the cavalcade, for here might be seen the athletic forms of the sturdy English yeomanry, clothed in the various splendid liveries of their several lords, with the family cognizance embroidered on the bosom or the arm, and the banners and banderols of their particular houses carried in the front of each company. Here also was to be seen the picked guard of the King of England, magnificently dressed for the occasion, with the royal banner carried in their centre, by the deputy standard bearer, and the banner of their company by their own ancient. In the rear of all, marshalled by officers appointed for the purpose, came the band of those whose rank did not entitle them to take place in the cavalcade, but who had sufficient interest at court to be admitted to the meeting. Though of an inferior class, this company was not the least splendid in the field, for here were all the wealthy tradesmen of the court, habited in many a rich garment, furnished by the extravagance of those that rode before; and many a gold chain hung round their necks, that not long ago had lain in the purse of some prodigal customer.

ing pace, with steeds neighing, with trumpets sounding; banners and plumes fluttering in the wind, and gold and jewels sparkling in the sunshine; while loud acclaim, and the waving of hats, and hands, and handkerchiefs, from those that staid behind, ushered it forth from the plain of Guisnes.

They had ridden on some way, when a horseman spurred up to the spot where the King rode, and doffing his high plumed hat, bent to his saddle bow, saying, "My King and my Sovereign, I have just been with the French party, and I hold myself bound as your liege, to inform you that they are at least twice as numerous as we are. Your Grace will act as in your wisdom you judge fit; but as a faithful and loving subject, I could not let such knowledge sleep in my bosom."

An instant halt took place through the whole cavalcade, and the King for a moment consulted with Wolsey, who rode on his left hand; but Lord Shrewsbury, the Lord Steward, interposed, assuring the King that he had been amongst the French nobles the night before, and that amongst them, the same reports prevailed concerning the English. "Therefore, Sir," continued he, "if I were worthy to advise, your Grace would march forward without hesitation ; for sure I am that the French mean no treachery."

"We shall follow your advice, Lord Steward," replied the King ; "let us march on."

"On before ! On before !" cried the heralds at the word. The trumpets again sounded, and the procession moving forward, very soon reached the brow of the hill that looks into the vale of Andern. A gentle slope, of not more than three hundred yards, led from the highest part of each of the opposite hills into the centre of the valley, in the midst of which was pitched the most magnificent tent, that ever a luxurious imagination devised. The canopy, the walls, the hangings, were all of cloth of gold ; the posts, the cones, the cords, the tassels, the furniture, were all of the same rare metal. Wherever the eye turned, nothing but that shining ore met its view, so that it required no very brilliant fancy to name it at once, the Field of the Cloth of Gold.

On reaching the verge of the descent, the cavalcade spread out, lining the side of the hill for some way down, and facing the line of the valley. Each cavalier placed himself unhesitatingly in the spot assigned him, by the officers of arms ; while the body of foot were drawn up in array to the left, by the captains of the King's guard ; so that not the least confusion or tumult took place ; and the whole multitude in perfect order, presented a long and glittering front to the opposite hill, before any of the French party appeared, except a few straggling horsemen sent to keep the ground.

As soon as the whole line was formed, and when by the approaching sound of the French trumpets, it was ascertained that the Court of France was not far distant, Henry himself drew out from the ranks, ready to descend to the meeting : and never did a more splendid, or more princely monarch present himself before so noble a host. Tall, stately, athletic, with a countenance full of imperious dignity, and mounted on a horse that seemed proudly conscious of the royalty of its rider, Henry rode forward to a small hillock, about twenty yards in advance of his subjects ; and halting upon the very edge of the hill, with his attendants grouped behind him, and a clear back-ground of sunny light, throwing his figure out from all the other objects, he offered a subject on which Wouvermans might well have exercised his pencil. Over his wide chest and shoulders, he wore a loose vest of cloth of silver, damasked and ribbed with gold. This was plaited and bound tightly towards the waist, while it was held down from the neck, by the golden collars of many a princely order, and the broad baldrick studded with jewels, to which was suspended his sword. His jewelled hat was also of the same cloth, and in the only representation of this famous meeting that I have met with, which can be relied upon,—having been executed at the time,—he appears with a vast plume of feathers, rising from the left side of his hat, and falling over to his saddle behind. Nor was the horse less splendidly attired than the rider. Its housings, its trappers, its headstall, and its reins, were all curiously wrought and embossed with bullion, while a thousand fanciful ornaments of gold filagree work, hung about it in every direction.

Behind the King appeared Sir Henry Guilford, Master of the Horse, leading a spare charger for the monarch; not indeed with any likelihood of the King using it, but more as a piece of state ornament than any thing else, in the same manner as the sword of state was borne by the Marquis of Dorset. A little behind, appeared nine youths of noble family, as the King's henchmen mounted on beautiful horses trapped with golden scales, and sprinkled throughout their housings, with loose bunches of spangles, which twinkling in the sunshine, gave an inconceivable lightness and brilliancy to their whole appearance.

Shortly after this glittering group had taken its station in front of the English line, the first parties of the French nobility began to appear on the opposite hill, and spreading out upon its side, offered a corresponding mass of splendour to that formed by the array of England. Very soon the whole of Francis's Court had deployed; and after a pause of a few minutes, during which the two hosts seemed to consider each other with no small admiration, and in profound silence, the trumpets from the French side sounded, and the Constable Duke of Bourbon, bearing a naked sword upright, began to descend the hill. Immediately behind him followed the French Monarch, superbly arrayed, and mounted on a magnificent Barbary horse, covered from head to foot with gold. Instantly on beholding this, the English trumpets replied, and the Marquis of Dorset, unsheathing the sword of state, moved slowly forward before the King. Henry having the Lord Cardinal on his left, and followed by his immediate suite, now descended the hill, and arrived in the valley exactly at the same moment as Francis. The two sword-bearers, who preceded them, fell back each to the right of his own sovereign; and the monarchs spurring forward their highly-managed horses, met in the midst and embraced each other on horseback. Difficult and strange as such a manœuvre may seem, it was performed with ease and grace, both the Kings being counted amongst the most skilful horsemen in Europe; and in truth, as the old historian expresses it, it must have been a marvellous sweet and goodly sight to see those two princes, in the flower of their age, in the height of their strength, and in the dignity of their manly beauty, commanding two great nations, that had been so long rivals and enemies, instead of leading hostile armies to desolate and destroy, meet in that peaceful valley, and embrace like brothers in the sight of the choice nobility of either land.

Two grooms and two pages, who had followed on foot, now ran to hold the stirrup and the rein, each of his own monarch; and springing to the ground, the Kings embraced again; after which, clasped arm in arm, they passed the barrier, and entered the golden tent, wherein two thrones were raised beneath one canopy.

“Henry of England, my dear brother,” said the King of France, as soon as they were seated, “thus far have I travelled to see you, and do you pleasure; willing to hold you to my heart with brotherly love, and to show you that I am your friend: and surely I believe that you esteem me as I am. The realms that I command, and the powers that I possess, are not small; but if they may ever be of aid to my brother, the King of England, I shall esteem them greater than before.”

“The greatness of your realms, Sir, and the extent of your power,” replied Henry, “weigh as nothing in my eyes, compared with your high and princely qualities; and it is to interchange regard with you, and renew in person our promises of love, that I have here passed the seas, and come to the very verge of my dominions.”

With such greetings commenced the interview of the two Kings, who soon called to them the Cardinal, and seating him beside them, with much honour, they commanded him to read the articles which he had drawn up, for the arrangement and ordering of their future interviews. Wolsey complied; and all that he proposed, seemed well to please both the monarchs, till he proceeded to stipulate, that when the King of England should go over to the town of Ardres, to revel with the Queen and ladies of France, the King of France should at the same time repair to the town of Guisnes, there to be entertained by the Queen of England. At this Francis mused, “Nay, nay, my good Lord Cardinal,” said he, “faith, I fear not to trust myself with my Brother of England, at his good castle of Guisnes; without holding him as a hostage in my court for my safe return; and marry I am sure he would put equal confidence in me, though I staid not in his city till he was on his journey back."

"This clause is not inserted, most Noble Sovereign," replied Wolsey, "from any doubt or suspicion that one gracious King has of the other; for surely all trust and amicable confidence exist between ye: but it is for the satisfaction of the minds of your liege subjects, who not understanding the true nature of princely friendship, might be filled with black apprehensions, were they to see their monarch confide himself, without warrant of safety, in the power of another nation."

"Well, well, my good Lord," replied Francis, "let it be, time will show us." And from that moment he seemed to pay little attention to all the precautionary measures by which the cautious Wolsey proposed to secure the future meetings of the two Kings, from the least danger to either party. The generous mind of the French monarch revolted at the suspicious policy of the Cardinal; and agreeing to any thing that the other thought proper, he mentally revolved his own plans for shaming the

The arrangement of these articles was the only displeasing circumstance that cast a shadow upon the meeting: all the rest past in gaiety and joy. A sumptuous banquet was soon placed before them, and various of the nobles of England and France, were called to mingle in the royal conversation, while the monarchs were at table.

In the meanwhile the two courts and their retainers remained arranged on the opposing sides of the hill; the Englishmen, with their characteristic rigidity, standing each man in his place as immoveable as a statue, while the livelier Frenchmen, impatient of doing nothing, soon quitted their ranks, and falling into broken masses, amused themselves as best they might; many of them crossing the valley, and with national facility beginning to make acquaintance with their new allies, nothing repulsed by the blunt reception they met with. Not that the English were inhospitable; for having, as usual, taken good care that no provision should be wanting against the calls of hunger or thirst, they communicated willingly to their neighbours of the comforts they had brought with them, sending over many a flaggon of wine and hypocras, much to the consolation of the French, who had taken no such wise precautions against the two great internal enemies.

In about an hour, the hangings of the tent were drawn back, and the two Kings reappeared, ready to separate for the day. The grooms led up the horses; and Francis and Henry embracing with many professions of amity, mounted and turned their steps each to his several dwelling.

The English procession marched back in the same order as it came, and arrived without interruption at the green plain of Guisnes, where Henry, ordering the band of footmen to halt, rode along before them, making them a gay and familiar speech, and bidding them be merry if they loved their King. Shouts and acclamations answered the monarch's speech, and the nobles joining in his intent, showered their largess upon their retainers as they followed along the line. The last band that Henry came to, was that of the privileged tradesmen of the court, most of whom he recognised, possessing, in a high degree, that truly royal quality of never forgetting any one he had once known. To each, he had some frank, bluff sentence to address, while they with heads uncapped and bending low, enjoyed with proud hearts the honour of being spoken to by the King, and thought how they could tell it to all their neighbours and gossips when they got to England. As he rode on, Henry perceived in the second rank, a face that he remembered, which being attached to a very pliable neck, kept bending down with manifold reverences, not unlike the nodding of a mandarin cast in china ware.

Jekin Groby rushed forward from behind, knocking on one side the royal honey merchant, and fairly throwing down the household fishmonger, who stood before him; then casting himself on his knees by the side of the King's horse, he clasped the palms of his hands together and turned up his eyes piteously to the monarch's countenance, exclaiming, "Justice! justice! your Grace's worship! If your royal stomach be full of justice, as folks say, give me justice."

"Justice!" cried Henry, laughing at the sad and deplorable face poor Jekin thought necessary to assume for the purpose of moving his compassion. "Justice on whom, man, ha? Faith, if any man have done thee wrong, he shall repent it, as I am a King—though good Jekin, I sent for thee a month ago, to furnish cloth for all the household, and thou wert not to be found."

"Lord 'a mercy!" cried Jekin, "and I've missed the job! but it ought all to be put in the bill.—Pray, your Grace's worship, put it in the bill, against that vile Sir Payan Wileton, who kidnapped me on your own royal high way, robbed me of my bag full of angels, and sent me to sea, where I was so sick, your Grace—you can't think how sick! And then they beat me with rope's ends, and made me go up aloft, and damned me for a landlubber, and a great deal more—all on account of that Sir Payan Wileton!”

“Ha!” cried the King, “Sir Payan Wileton again! I had forgot him!—However, good Jekin, I cannot hear you now—come to my chamber to-morrow before I rise, ha man? then I will hear and do you justice, if it be on the highest man in the land. There is my signet—the page will let you in—at six o’clock man, fail not!”

“I told you so!” cried Jekin, starting upon his feet, and looking round him with delight as the King rode away; “I told you, he would make that black thief give me back my angels. I knew his noble heart—Lord ’a mercy, ’tis a gracious Prince, surely!”

CHAPTER XII.

“ — Let some o’ the guard be ready.

CRAN.—For me?

Must I go like a traitor then?”

SHAKSPEARE.

AND where was Osborne Darnley, all this while?

Wait a little, dearly beloved, and you shall hear more. It was not yet five o’clock in the morning, and a sweet morning it was—the sun had just risen; and spreading all over the eastern sky, there was that soft lustrous tint of early light, that surely ought be called hope-colour, it promises so many bright moments for the coming day.—It was not yet five o’clock in the morning, when the western sally-port of the castle of Ardres, was opened by a little page not higher than my thumb, as the old storybook goes, who looked cautiously about, first to the right, and then to the left, to see if any one was abroad and stirring ; but the only person who had risen, was the matutinal sun, so that the page could see nothing but the blue sky, and the green fields, and the grey stone walls of the castle, whose ancientness, like the antiquity of a beggar's coat, had plastered them all over with patches of green and yellow lichens. Having looked to his heart's content, he next listened ; but no sound could he hear, but the light singing of the lark, and the loud snoring of the sentinel on the neighbouring bastion, who with head propped on his halberd, kept any thing but silent watch, while the vigilant sun, looking over the wall, spied out all the weaknesses of the place ; and now having listened as well as looked, the boy withdrew once more within the walls. He left, however, the door open, and in a few minutes two horsemen rode forth, each wrapped up in a large Spanish cloak, with a chaperon, as Fleurange calls it, or in other words, an immense hood, which covered the whole head, and disguised the person completely.

As soon as they were fairly out, the page, who had accompanied them so far, returned, and closed the sally-port; and the two travellers cantered lightly over the green, to a little wood that lay before the castle. When they were fully concealed by the trees, among which they wound along, following the sinuosities of a little sandy road, wherein two, but only two, might ride abreast, they both, as by common consent, threw back their hoods, and letting their cloaks fall upon their horse's crupper, discovered the two powerful forms of the good Knight, Osborne Lord Darnley, and Francis the First, King of France. Both were dressed with much magnificence, and both so similarly (for so the King had willed), that though one was a very dark man, and the other fair, they might well have been taken for two noble brothers; each bearing the star and collar of St. Michael, with the velvet mortier and short white plume, the embroidered cloak of purple velvet, fixed on the right shoulder, and fastened round to the girdle beneath the left elbow, and the broad gold baldrick, with the heavy double-edged sword.

“ Well, my friend, and my deliverer,” said the King, as they rode on, “ ’twill go hard, but I will restore you to your King’s favour ; and even should he remain inexorable, which I will not believe, you must make France your country. We will try to win your fair Constance for you from that suspicious Cardinal, of which fear not, for I know a certain way to gain him to any thing ; and then I see no cause, why in so fair a land as France, and favoured by her King, you may not be as happy as in that little sea-bound spot called England.”

By this, it will easily be seen, that Sir Osborne had confided in the French King some of even his most private thoughts ; and had given him an insight into his hopes and wishes, as well as into his former expectations and their disappointment. There was a generous frankness about Francis, whose contagion was very difficult to resist, nor would the Knight have had any object in resisting it.

Before proceeding farther, however, it may be necessary to say a few words concerning the events which had occurred since the Knight’s courage and skill had saved the King’s life from Shoenvelt and his adventurers. One may well imagine, what anxiety had reigned amongst the monarch's followers, in the forest near Lillers, when they found that Francis, after having separated from their party, did not re-join them on the track appointed for the hunt. Such occurrences, however, having several times happened before, and the King having always returned in safety, they concluded that he, and Count William of Firstenberg, must have taken the other road to Aire, and that they would find him there on their arrival. When they did reach that town, their inquiries immediately announced that the King was missing.

The news spread rapidly to the whole court, and soon reached the ears of his mother the Duchess of Angoulême, who became almost frantic on hearing it, giving him up for lost from that moment, as she had good reasons to believe that Count William entertained designs against his life. Her active spirit it was, that first discovered the treachery of the Burgundian, which she had instantly communicated to the King; but the generous mind of Francis refused all credit to the news, and he continued his confidence toward Firstenberg, without the slightest alteration, till at length, more certain proofs of his designs were obtained, which induced the monarch to act with that fearless magnanimity which we have seen him display towards his treacherous favourite in the forest of Lillers.

Immediately that the King's absence was known, bands of horsemen were sent out in various directions to obtain news of him, but in vain. Convinced, by the account of the hunters, that he had quitted the wood, and that if he were therein they could not find him by night, they searched in every other place than that in which they were likely to be successful, so that the whole night that Francis spent sleeping tranquilly in the Charbonier's cottage, his guards were out towards Pernès, Fruges, and St. Pol, searching for him without success. When morning came, however, fresh parties were sent off to examine every part of the forest, and it was one of these that came up to the spot not long after the defeat of Shoenvelt and his party.

The joy occasioned by the King's safe return, was not a little heightened by the danger he had undergone, and every one to whom his life was precious, contended who should do more honour to his gallant deliverer. Francis himself knew not what recompense to offer to Sir Osborne for the signal service he had rendered him; and with the delicacy of a truly generous mind, he exacted from him a particular account of his whole life, that he might adapt the gift or honour he wished to confer exactly to the situation of the Knight. Darnley understood the motive of the noble-hearted monarch, and told him all without reserve; and Francis, now furnished with the best means of showing his gratitude, resolved not to lose the opportunity.

Thus, for the few days that preceded the meeting between Guisnes and Ardres, the King highly distinguished the Knight, made him many magnificent presents, called a chapter of the order of St. Michael, and had him installed in form; but knowing the jealous nature of his own nobles, he offered him no employment in his service; and even when the Constable

Bourbon, who knew and appreciated Darnley's military talents, proposed to the King to give him a company of men-at-arms, as a reward for the great service he had rendered to the whole nation, Francis negatived it at once, saying openly, that the Lord Darnley was but a visitor at the court of France.

Having premised thus much, we will now take up the travellers again at the moment of their entering into the wood, near Ardres, through which they passed, conversing over the various circumstances of Sir Osborne's situation.

“It is strange!” said Francis, as the Knight repeated the manner of his dismissal from the English court; “I do not comprehend it! It is impossible that your going there under a feigned name, to win King Henry's favour, should be construed as a crime, and made matter of such strong accusation against you.” After musing for a moment, he proceeded, “Do not think I would imply, good Knight, that you could be really guilty of any higher offence against your King; but be you sure, something has been laid to your charge more than you imagine.”

“On my honour as a Knight,” replied Darnley, “I have accused myself to your Highness of the worst crimes upon my conscience, as if your Grace were my confessor; though I will own, that it appears to me, also, most strange and inexplicable. I have heard, indeed, that the Lord Cardinal never suffers any one to be too near the King’s regard; and that if he sees any especial favour shown, he is sure to find some accusation against its object; but I can hardly believe that so great a man would debase himself, to be a false accuser.”

“I know not! I know not!” answered Francis quickly, “there is nothing so jealous as a favourite; and what will not jealousy do? My diadem against a Spanish crown,”* he continued laughingly, referring to his contention with the Emperor Charles, “Henry of England knows you under no other name than that of Sir Osborne Maurice. However, I will be politic, and know the whole before I speak. Do you put your honour in my hands? and will you abide by what I shall undertake for you?”

* The original words of Francis were ma lance contre un ecu d’Espagne, ecu meaning either a shield or a crown-piece.

“Most willingly, your Highness,” replied the Knight, “whatever you say for me, that will I maintain; on horseback or on foot, with sword or lance, as long as my life do hold.”

Thus conversing they rode on, following the windings of the woody lane in which they were, till the forest, skirting on to the north-west of Ardres, opened out upon the plain of Guisnes. As soon as the castle and town were in sight, the French monarch put his horse into a quick pace, saying with a smile to Sir Osborne,—“Your prudent Wolsey, and my good brother Henry, will be much surprised to see me in their castle alone, after all their grave precautions. By heaven! did kingly dignity imply suspicion of all the world like theirs, I would tear away my crown and feed my mother’s sheep.”

The night after the first meeting of the Kings, Henry had retired to sleep in the fortress, rather than in his palace without the walls; part of which, comprising his private apartments, had been found insecure, from the hurry in which it had been built. Of this circumstance, the King of France had been informed by some of his court, who had passed their evening at Guisnes, and it was therefore to the castle that he turned his rein.

Passing amidst the tents, in most of which Somnus still held undisturbed dominion, Francis and Sir Osborne galloped up to the drawbridge, on which an early party of the guard were sunning themselves in the morning light; some looking idly over into the moat, some gazing with half closed eyes towards the sky; some playing at an antique and classical game with mutton bones, while their captain stood by the portcullis, rubbing his hands and enjoying the sweetness of the morning.

No sooner did Francis perceive them, than drawing his sword he galloped in amongst them, crying, — “Rendez vous, Messieurs, rendez vous ! La place est à moi.”

At first, the archers scattered back confused, and some had their hands on their short swords; but several who had seen the King the day before, almost instantly recognized him, and the cry became general of “The King of France ! The King of France !” In the mean time,

Francis rode up to the captain, and putting his sword's point to the officer's throat, "Yield!" cried he, "rescue or no rescue, or you are a dead man."

"I yield, I yield! my Lord!" cried the captain, entering into the King's humour, and bending his knee. "Rescue or no rescue, I yield myself your Grace's prisoner."

"A castle soon taken," cried Francis, turning to Sir Osborne. "Now," added he to the officer, "since the place is mine, lead me to the chamber of my good brother the King of England."

"His Grace is at present asleep," replied the captain hesitating. "If your Highness will repose yourself in the great hall, he shall be informed instantly of your presence."

"No, no," cried the King, "show me his chamber. Nothing will serve me, but that I will sound his reveillez myself.—Come, Darnley," and springing from his horse he followed the officer, who, now forced to obey, led him into the castle, and up the grand staircase, towards the King's bed-chamber.

All was silence as they went. Henry and the whole court had revelled late the night before, so that few even of the serving men had thought fit to quit their truckle beds so early in the morning. A single page, however, was to be seen as they entered a long corridor, which took up one whole side of the large square tower in the centre of the castle. He was standing before a door at the farther extremity; and to him the Captain pointed. "The King's anteroom, your Highness, is where you see that Page," said he, "and let me beg your gracious forgiveness if I leave you here, for, indeed, I dare conduct you no farther."

"Go, go," cried the King good humouredly. "I will find it now myself. You, Darnley, stay here. I doubt not soon to send for you with good news."

With his sword still drawn in his hand, the King now advanced to the Page, who seeing a stranger come forward with so menacing an air, might have entertained some fears, had he not beheld the Captain of the Guard conduct him thither; not at all knowing the person of Francis, however, as he had not been present at the meeting of the Kings, he closed the door of the anteroom, which had before been open behind him, and, placing himself in the way, prepared to oppose the entrance of any one.

“Which is the chamber of my brother, the King of England?” demanded Francis as he came up; but the Page, not understanding a word of French, only shook his head; keeping his back, at the same time, firmly against the door, thinking that it was some wild French Lord, who knew not what was due to royalty.

“It is the King of France,” said Sir Osborne advancing, as he beheld the Page’s embarrassment. “Let him pass. It is the King of France.”

The Page stared and hesitated, but Francis, taking him by the shoulder, twisted him round as he had been a child, and opening the door passed in. The Page immediately closed it again, putting himself before the Knight, whose face he now remembered. “I must not let your worship in,” said he, thinking Sir Osborne wished to follow the monarch. “The King of France of course, I dared not stop, but it is as much as my life is worth to suffer any one else to pass."

"I seek not to enter, good Master Snell," said the Knight. "Unless his Grace sends for me, I shall not intrude myself on his royal presence." This said, with busy thoughts he began to walk up and down the gallery, and the Page, presently after, retiring into the ante-chamber, left him, for the time, to his own contemplations.

Much subject had the Knight for thought, though it was of that nature that profiteth not: for little signified it, as it seemed, how-much-soever he took counsel with himself, his fate was in the hands of others, and beyond his power to influence or determine.

He could not help musing however, over all the strange turns which his fortune had taken within the brief space of the last three months; and strangely mingled were his sensations, on finding himself, at the end of the review, standing there, once more within the precincts of the court of England, from which he had been driven hardly fifteen days before. A thousand collateral ideas also presented themselves to his mind, suggesting a thousand doubts and fears for those he loved best. What had become of Constance de Grey? he asked himself, and though never had her image for one moment left his mind in his wanderings, though it had been his companion in the journey, his solace in his waking hours, his dream by night, and his object in every thought and hope, still there was something in being amongst those objects, and near those beings, amidst whom he had been accustomed to see her, that rendered his anxiety about her more impatient; and he would have given no small sum for the presence of one of the newsmongers of the court—those empty idle beings always to be found near the presence of Princes, who like scavengers' carts, make themselves the common receptacle for all the drift of the palace, and hurrying on from one to another, at once receive and spatter forth the rakings of all kennels as they go along.

But no one, whom he could even question, came near him; though from time to time several of the royal servants would pass along the corridor on their various occupations, staring at him as they went by, some remembering him and bowing low, not a little surprised to see him there; some contenting themselves with a critical examination of his dress, and then passing on.

Time, ever long to those who wait, seemed doubly long to Sir Osborne, to whom so much was in suspense; and so little bustle and activity did there seem in the castle, that he began to fancy that its denizens must have had their eyes touched with Hermes' wand to make them sleep so sound. He walked up and down the corridor, he gazed out of the window into the court-yard, he listened for every opening door. But it was all in vain; no one came—Could Francis have forgotten him? he asked himself at last: and then he thought, how quickly from the light memories of the great, pass away the sorrows or the welfare of their fellow-creatures; how hardly can they remember, and how happily can they forget—But no, he would not believe it. If ever man was renowned for that best and rarest quality of a great man, a heedful remembrance of those who served him, a thoughtful care of those he esteemed, it was Francis of France: and Darnley would not believe that in his case he had forgotten.

Still no one came, though the various noises and the bustle he began to hear in distant parts of the building, announced that the world was more awake than when he arrived. Yet the corridor in which he was, seemed more deserted than ever. The royal servants ceased to pass through, the page showed himself no more, and yet he could distinctly hear steps hurrying along in different directions, and voices, some loud, and some subdued, speaking not far off. Full a hundred times he paced the corridor without a living being passing by; and tired at length, he again placed himself at the window, examining what passed in the court below.

At first it was nearly vacant, a few listless soldiers being its only occupants; but soon there was opened on the other side, a door which communicated with a sort of barrack, situated near the chapel in the inner ballium, and from this proceeded a troop of soldiers and officers of arms, with one or two persons mingled amongst them, that Sir Osborne imagined to be prisoners. The height at which he was placed above them prevented his perceiving whether this was certainly the case, or seeing their faces, for all that he could discern, was the foreshortened figures of the soldiers and sergeants-at-arms, distinguished from the others by their official habiliments, and passing along, surrounded by the rest, some persons in darker attire, round whom the guard appeared to keep with vigilant care. An instant brought them to the archway, just beneath the spot where he stood, and they were then lost to his sight.

The castle clock struck seven, but so slowly did the hammer fall upon the bell, he thought it would never have done. He now heard a sound of much speaking not far off, and thought that surely it was Francis taking leave of the King of England; but suddenly it ceased, and all was again silence. Taking patience to his aid, he began again his perambulations; and for another quarter of an hour walked up and down the corridor, hearing still, as he passed the door of the anteroom, a low and indistinct murmuring, which might be either the page speaking in a subdued tone to some other person therein, or some other voices conversing much more loudly in the chamber beyond. The Knight's feelings were wound up to the highest pitch of impatience, when suddenly a deep groan, and then a heavy fall, met his ear. He paused—listened, and could plainly distinguish a door within open, and various voices speaking quick and high; some in French, some in English; but among them was to be heard distinctly the tongue of Henry, and that of Francis,—though what they said was not sufficiently audible to be comprehended. His curiosity, as may be conceived, was not a little excited; but satisfied of the safety of the two Kings, and fearful of being suspected of eaves-dropping, if any one came forth, he once more crossed his arms upon his breast, and began pacing backwards and forwards as before.

A few minutes more elapsed in silence, but at length, when he was at the farther extreme of the corridor, he heard the door of the antechamber open, and turning round, perceived a sergent-at-arms, followed by four halber-diers, come forth from within, and advance towards him. Sir Osborne turned and met them, when the guard drew up across the passage, and the officer stepped forward.—“Sir Osborne Darnley !” said he, “commonly called Lord Darnley, I arrest you for high treason, in the name of Henry the Eighth King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, and charge you to surrender to his warrant.”

The astonishment of Sir Osborne may more easily be conceived than described. The first appearance of the halberdiers had struck him as strange, and their drawing up across his path might have been some warning, but still he was not at all prepared.

Trusting to the protection of the French King, who had virtually rendered himself responsible for his safety, he had never dreamed of danger ; and for a moment or two he stood in silent surprise, till the sergeant demanded, “Do you surrender, my Lord ?”

“Of course, of course !” replied the Knight, “though I will own that this has fallen upon me unexpectedly. Prythee, good sergeant, if thou knowest, tell me how this has come about, for to me it is inexplicable.”

“In truth, my Lord, I know nothing,” replied the officer, “though I believe that the whole arose from something that happened this morning in his Grace’s bed-chamber. I was sent for by the back staircase, and received orders to attach you here. It is an unpleasant duty, my Lord, but one which we are too often called to perform; I can, therefore, but beg your forgiveness, and say that you must come with me.”

Sir Osborne followed in silence, meditating more than ever over his strange fate. His hopes had again been buoyed up, again to be cast down in a more cruel manner than before. There was not now a shade of doubt left: whatever he was accused of was aimed at him under his real name; and it was evident, from the unremitted persecution which he suffered, that Wolsey, or whosoever it was that thus pursued him, was resolved on accomplishing his destruction by all, or any means.

He found some consolation, nevertheless, in reflecting, that he should now have an opportunity of defending his honour and loyalty from any imputation that had been cast upon it, and of proving himself innocent to the conviction of the good and just ; although he knew too well, that this was no assurance of safety, against the enmity of the great and powerful.

That Wolsey was the originator of the whole, he could not doubt ; and the virulence of his jealousy was too well known to hope that justice or clemency would be shown, where his enmity had been incurred. “ However,” thought the Knight, “ at last, I can but die : I have fronted death a hundred times in the battle-field, and I will not shrink from him now : ” but to die as a traitor was bitter, he who had never been aught but loyal and true : but still his conscious innocence, he thought, would rob the block and axe of their worst horror. The proud knowledge that he had acted well in every relationship of life,—to his King, to his Country, to those he loved. Then came the thought of Constance de Grey, in all her summer beauty, and all her gentle loveliness, and all her sweet smiles : was he never to see them again? To be cut off from all those kind sympathies he had felt,—to go down into the cold dark grave where they could reach him never more,—it was too much; and Sir Osborne turned away his eyes.

While these thoughts were busy in his bosom, the sergeant-at-arms led him down the great staircase, and across the hall, on the ground floor of the castle, then opening a door to the right, he entered into a long narrow passage, but scantily lighted, that terminated in another spiral staircase, down which one of the soldiers, who had procured a lamp in the hall, proceeded first, to light them. Sir Osborne followed in silence, though his heart somewhat burned at the idea of being committed to a dungeon. Arrived at the bottom of the steps, several doors presented themselves; and seeing the sergeant examining a large bunch of keys, with whose various marks he did not seem very well acquainted, the Knight could not refrain from demanding, if it were by the King's command, that he was about to give him such a lodging.

“No, my Lord,” replied the sergeant, “the King did not direct me to place you in a dungeon: but I must secure your Lordship's person, till such time as the horses are ready to convey you to Calais, and every other place in the castle is full, but that where I am going to put you."

"Well, Sir," replied the Knight, "only beware of what treatment you do show me, lest you may be sorry for it hereafter."

"Indeed, my Lord," answered the man, with a good humoured smile, rarely met with on the faces of his brethren, "I should be very sorry to make your Lordship any way uncomfortable, and if you will give me your word of honour, as a Knight, neither to escape, nor to make any attempt to escape, while you are there, I will lock you up in the chapel of the new palace, which is empty enough, God knows, and for half an hour, you will be there as well as any where else—better than in a dungeon certainly."

The Knight readily gave his promise, and the sergeant, after examining the keys again, without better success than before, began to try them, one after another, upon a small iron door in the wall, saying that they could get out that way to the chapel. One of them at length fitted the lock, and two enormous bolts, and an iron bar being removed, the door was swung back, giving egress from the body of the fortress, into a long lightsome passage, where the full sun shone through a long row of windows on each side; while the gilded pillars, and the enamelled ornaments round the windows, the rich arras hangings between them, and the fine carpets spread over the floor, formed a strange and magical contrast with the place they had just quitted, with its rough, damp, stone walls, its dark and gloomy passages, and the massy rudeness of all its features.

“This is the passage made for his Grace, between the palace and the castle,” said the sergeant-at-arms, “let us haste on, my Lord, for fear he should chance to come along it.”

Proceeding onwards, catching every now and then a glance at the gay scene of tents without, as they passed the different windows, the officer conducted his prisoner to the end of the passage, where they found a door on either hand; and opening that to the left, he ushered the Knight into the beautiful little building that had been constructed as a temporary chapel for the court, while inhabiting the palace before Guisnes.

“ I know, my Lord,” said the officer, “ that I may trust to your knightly word and promise, not to make any attempt to escape, for I must not even leave a guard at the door, lest his Grace the King should pass, and find that I have put you here, which might move his anger. I therefore leave you for a while, reposing full confidence in your honour, and will take care to have the horses prepared, and be back again before the hour of mass.” Thus saying, he ascertained that the other door was fastened, and left Sir Osborne in the chapel, taking heed, notwithstanding his professions of reliance, to turn the key upon him as he went out.

It matters little whether it be a palace or a dungeon wherein he passes the few last hours of life to the prisoner condemned to die, without he possesses one of those happy spirits that can, by the aid of external objects, abstract their thoughts from all that is painful in their fate. If he do indeed, the things around may give him some relief. So, however, could not Darn-ley; and in point of any mental ease, he might just as well have been in the lowest dungeon of the castle, as in the splendid oratory where he now was. Yet feeling how fruitless was the contemplation of his situation, how little but pain he could derive from thought, and how unnerving to all his energies was the memory of Constance de Grey, under the unhappy circumstances of the present, he strove not to think; and gazed around him to divert his mind from his wayward fortunes, by occupying it with the glittering things around.

Indeed, as far as splendour went, that chapel might have vied with any thing that ever was devised. In length, it was about fifty feet, and though built of wood, its architecture was in that style which we are accustomed to call gothic. Nothing, however, of the mere walls appeared, for from the roof to the ground, it was hung with cloth of gold, over which fell various festoons of silk, breaking the straight lines of the hangings. To the right and left, Sir Osborne remarked two magnificent closets, appropriated, as he supposed, to the use of the King and Queen, where the same costly stuff that lined the rest of the building, was further enriched by a thick embroidery of precious stones; each also had its particular altar, loaded, besides the pax, the crucifix, and the candlesticks, with twelve large images of gold, and a crowd of other ornaments.

The grand altar was still more splendid, the altar-cloth itself being one mass of gold and jewels, and the twelve images of gold with which it was decorated, being, according to Hall, each of the size of a child four years old. An immense canopy of embroidery of pearls overhung it, while round on all sides appeared basins and censers, pixes, gossellers, cruets, paxes, and chalices, of the same glittering materials as the rest of the ornaments.

Sir Osborne advanced, and fixed his eyes upon all the splendid things that were there called in to give pomp and majesty to the worship of the Most High; but he felt more strongly than ever, at that moment, how it was all in vain; and that the small, calm tabernacle of the heart, is that wherein man may offer up the fittest prayer unto his Maker.

Kneeling, however, on the step of the altar, he addressed his petitions to Heaven. He would not pray to be delivered from danger, for that he thought cowardly ; but he prayed that God would establish his innocence and his honor, —that God would protect and bless those that he loved ; and if it were the Almighty's will he should fall before his enemies, that God would be a support to his father, and a shield to Constance de Grey. Then rising from his knee, Darnley found that his heart was lightened, and that he could look upon his future fate with far more calmness than before.

At that moment the sound of trumpets and clarions met his ear from a distance : gradually it swelled nearer and more near, with gay and martial tones, and approached close to where he was, while shouts and acclamations, and loud and laughing voices mingled with the music, strangely discording with all that was passing in his heart. Presently it grew fainter, and then ceased ; though still he thought he could hear the roar of the distant multitude, and now and then a shout ; but in a few minutes these also ceased, and crossing his arms upon his breast, he waited till the sergeant-at-arms should come to convey him to Calais, to prison, perhaps ultimately to death.

In a few minutes, some distant steps were heard; they came nearer, nearer still—the key was turned in the lock, and the door opened.—

CHAPTER XIII.

“ With shame and sorrow fill’d—
Shame for his folly ; sorrow out of time
For plotting an unprofitable crime.”

DRYDEN.

WE must once more take our readers back, if it be but for the space of a couple of hours, and introduce them into the bed-chamber of a King—a place, we believe, as yet sacred from the sacrilegious foot of any novelist.

In the castle of Guisnes then, and in the sleeping-room of Henry the Eighth, King of England, stood, exactly opposite the window, a large square bed, covered with a rich coverlet of arras, which hanging down on each side swept the floor with its golden fringe. High over head, attached to the wall, was a broad and curiously-wrought canopy, whereon the laborious needle of some British Penelope had traced, with threads of gold, the rare and curious history of that famous Knight, Alexander the Great, who was there represented with lance in rest, drest in a suit of Almaine rivet armour, overthrowing King Darius : who for his part, being in a mighty fright, was whacking on his clumsy elephant, with his sceptre, while the son of Philip, with more effect, appeared pricking him up under the ribs with the point of his spear.

In one corner of the chamber, ranged in fair and goodly order, were to be seen several golden lavers and ewers, together with fine diapers and other implements for washing, while hard by, was an open closet filled with linen and plate of various kinds, with several Venice glasses, a mirror, and a bottle of scented-waters. In addition to these pieces of furniture appeared four wooden settles of carved oak, which with two large rich chairs of ivory and gold, made up, that day, the furniture of a king's bed-chamber.

The square lattice window was half open, letting in the sweet breath of the summer morning upon Henry himself, who, with his head half covered with a black velvet night-cap, embroidered with gold, still lay in bed, supporting himself on his elbow, and listening to a long detail of grievances poured forth from the rotund mouth of honest Jekin Groby, who by the King's command, encumbered with his weighty bulk one of the ivory chairs by the royal bedside.

Somewhat proud of having had a Lord for the companion of his perils, the worthy clothier enlarged mightily upon the seizure of himself and Lord Darnley by Sir Payan Wileton, seasoning his discourse pretty thickly with "My Lord did,"—and "My Lord said;" but omitting altogether to mention him by the name of Sir Osborne, thinking it would be a degradation to his high companionship so to do, though had he done so but once, it would have saved many of the misfortunes that afterwards befel.

Henry heard him calmly, till he related the threats which Sir Payan held out to his prisoner in that interview, to which Jekin had been an unperceived witness: then starting up, "Mother of God!" cried the King, "what has become of the young gallant? Where is he? ha man? Now, heaven defend us, the base traitor has not murdered him! ha?"

"Lord a' mercy, you've kicked all the clothes off your Grace's worship," cried Jekin; "let me kiver you up! you'll catch a mal-plexy! you will!"

"God's life, answer me, man!" cried Henry. "What has become of the young Lord, Osborne Darnley? ha?"

"Bless your Grace, that's just what I cannot tell you," replied Jekin, "for I never saw him after we got out o' window."

"Send for the traitor! have him brought instantly!" exclaimed the King. "See who knocks! Let no one in! Who dares knock so loud at my chamber-door?"

Proceeding round the King's bed, Jekin opened the door, against which some one had been thumping with very little ceremony: but in a moment the valiant clothier started back, exclaiming, "Lord a' mercy, it's a great man with a drawn sword!"

"A drawn sword!" cried Henry, starting up, and snatching his own weapon, which lay beside him. But at that moment Francis ran in, and holding his blade over the King, commanded him to surrender.

“ I yield !—I yield !” exclaimed Henry, delighted with the jest. “ Now, by my life, my good brother of France, thou hast shown me the best turn ever Prince showed another.—I yield me your prisoner ; and as sign of my faith, I beg you to accept this jewel.” So saying, he took from his pillow, where it had been laid the night before, a rich bracelet of emeralds, and clasped it on the French King’s arm.

“ I receive it willingly,” answered Francis ; “ but for my love and amity, and also as my prisoner, you must wear this chain ;” and unclasping a jewelled collar from his neck, he laid it down beside the English Monarch.

Many were the civilities and reciprocations of friendly speeches that now ensued ; and Henry, about to rise, would fain have called an attendant to assist him, but Francis took the office on himself,—“ Come, I will be your valet for this morning," said he; "no one but I shall give you your shirt; for I have come over alone to beg some boons of you."

"They are granted from this moment," replied Henry. "But do you say you came alone? Do you mean unattended?"

"With but one faithful friend," answered the French King, "one who not a week ago saved my life by the valour of his arm. 'Tis the best knight that ever charged a lance, and the noblest heart—he is your subject too!"

"Mine!" cried Henry with some surprise. "How is he called? What is his name? Say, France, and we will love him for his service to you."

"First, hear how he did serve me," replied Francis; and while the English Monarch threaded the intricate mazes of the toilet, he narrated the whole of his adventure with Shoenvelt, which not a little interested Henry, the knight-errantry of whose disposition took fire at the vivid recital of the French King, and almost made him fancy himself on the spot.

"A gallant Knight!" cried he at length, as the King of France detailed the exploits of Sir Osborne ; “ a most gallant Knight, on my life ! But say, my brother, what is his name ? ’Slife, man, let us hear it. I long to know him.”

“ His name,” replied Francis with an indifferent tone, but at the same time fixing his eyes on Henry’s face, to see what effect his answer would produce,—“ His name is Sir Osborne Maurice.”

A cloud came over the countenance of the English King. “ Ha !” said he thoughtfully, jealous perhaps in some degree that the splendid chivalrous qualities of the young Knight should be transferred to the court of France. “ It is like him.—It is very like him. For courage and for feats of arms, I, who have seen many good Knights, have rarely seen his equal.—Pity it is that he should be a traitor.”

“ Nay, nay, my good brother of England,” answered Francis ; “ I will avouch him no traitor, but of unimpeachable loyalty. All I regret is, that his love for your noble person, and for the court of England, should make him wish to quit me. But to the point. My first boon regards him. He seeks not to return to your royal favour with honour stained and faith doubtful, but he claims your gracious permission to defy his enemies, and to prove their falsehood with his arm. If they be men, let them meet him in fair field; if they be women, or churchmen, lame, or in any way incompetent according to the law of arms, let them have a champion, the best in France or England. To regain your favour and to prove his innocence, he will defy them be they who they may; and here at your feet, I lay down his gage of battle, so confident in his faith and worth, that I myself will be his godfather in the fight. He waits here in the corridor to know your royal pleasure."

Henry thought for a moment. He was not at all willing that the court of Francis, already renowned for its chivalry, should possess still another Knight of so much prowess and skill as he could not but admit in Sir Osborne. Yet the accusations that had been laid against him, and which nobody who considers them—the letter of the Duke of Buckingham, and the evidence of Wilson the bailiff—can deny were plausible, still rankled in the King's mind, notwithstanding the partial explanation which Lady Katrine Bulmer had afforded respecting the Knight's influence with the Rochester rioters. Remembering, however, that the whole, or greater part of the information which Wolsey had laid before him, had been obtained, either directly or indirectly, from Sir Payan Wileton, he at length replied, "By my faith, I know not what to say: it is not wise to take the sword from the hand of the law, and trust to private valour to maintain public justice, more than we can avoid.—But you, my royal brother, shall in the present case decide. The accusations against this Sir Osborne Maurice, are many and heavy, but principally resting on the testimonies produced by a certain wealthy and powerful Knight, one Sir Payan Wileton, who, though in other respects, most assuredly a base and disloyal villain, can have no enmity against Sir Osborne, and no interest in seeking his ruin. Last night, by my order, this Sir Payan was brought hither from Calais, on the accusations of that good fool (pointing to Jekin Groby.)

You comprehend enough of our hard English tongue, to hear him examined yourself, and thus you shall judge. If you find that there is cause to suspect Sir Payan and his witnesses, though it be but in having given the slightest colour of falsehood to their testimony, let Sir Osborne's arm decide his quarrel against the other knight; but if their evidence be clear and indubitable, you shall yield him to be judged by the English law—What say you? Is it not just?"

The King of France at once agreed to the proposal, and Henry turned to Jekin, who had stood by, listening with his mouth open, wonderfully edified at hearing the two Kings converse, though he understood not a word of the language in which they spoke. "Fly to the Page, man," cried the King; "tell him to bid those who have Sir Payan Wileton in custody bring him hither instantly by the back staircase; but first, send to the reverend Lord Cardinal, requiring his counsel in the King's chamber. Haste! dally not I say—I would have them here directly."

Jekin hurried to obey; and after he had delivered the order, returned to the King's chamber, where Henry, while he completed the adjustment of his apparel, related to Francis the nature of the accusation against Sir Osborne, and the proofs that had been adduced of it. The King of France, however, with a mind less susceptible of suspicion, would not believe a word of it, maintaining that the witnesses were suborned, and the letter a forgery ; and contended, it would most certainly appear, that Sir Payan had some deep interest in the ruin of the Knight.

The sound of many steps in the antechamber, soon announced that some one had arrived. “ Quick,” cried Henry to Jekin Groby, “ get behind the arras, good Jekin. After we have dispatched this first business, I would ask the traitor some questions, before he sees thee. Ensconce thee, man ! ensconce thee ! quick !”

At the King’s command, poor Jekin lifted up the corner of the arras, by the side of the bed, and hid himself behind ; but though a considerable space existed between the hangings and the wall, the worthy clothier having, as we have hinted, several very protuberant contours in his person, his figure was somewhat discernible still, swelling out the stomach of King Solomon, and the hip of the Queen of Sheba, who were represented in the tapestry, as if one was crooked, and the other had the dropsy.

Scarcely was he concealed, when the page threw open the door, and Cardinal Wolsey entered in haste, somewhat surprised at being called to the King's chamber at so early an hour; but the sight of the French King sufficiently explained the summons, and he advanced, bending low with a proud affectation of humility.

“God bless and shield your Graces both!” said he, “I feared some evil, by this early call; but now I find that the occasion was one of joy, I do not regret the haste that apprehension gave me.”

“Still, we have business, my good Wolsey,” replied Henry, “and of some moment. My brother here of France, espouses much the cause of the Sir Osborne Maurice who lately sojourned at the court, and won the good will of all, both by his feats of arms and his high-born and noble demeanour; who on the accusations given against him, to you, Lord Cardinal, by Sir Payan Wileton, was banished from the court—nay, judged worthy of attachment for treason.”

The King, in addressing Wolsey, instead of speaking in French, which had been the language used between him and Francis, had returned to his native tongue; and good Jekin Groby, hearing what passed concerning Sir Osborne Maurice, was seized with an intolerable desire to have his say too. “Lord a ’mercy!” cried he, popping his head from behind the tapestry, “your Grace’s worship don’t know—”

“Silence!” cried Henry, in a voice that made poor Jekin shrink into nothing: “Said I not to stay there, ha?”

The worthy clothier drew back his head behind the arras, like a frightened tortoise retracting its noddle within the shelter of its shell; and Henry proceeded to explain to Wolsey, in French, what had passed between himself and Francis.

The Cardinal was, at that moment, striving hard for the King of France’s favour, nor was his resentment towards Sir Payan at all abated, though the arrangements of the first meeting between the kings had hitherto delayed its effects. Thus all at first seemed favourable to Sir Osborne, and the Minister himself began to soften the evidence against him, when Sir Payan, escorted by a party of archers and a sergeant-at-arms, was conducted into the King's chamber. The guard drew up across the door of the anti-room, and the knight, with a pale but determined countenance, and a firm heavy step, advanced into the centre of the room, and made his obeisance to the Kings. Henry, now dressed, drew forward one of the ivory chairs for Francis, and the sergeant hastened to place the other by its side for the British Monarch; when, both being seated with Wolsey by their side, the whole group would have formed as strange but powerful a picture, as ever employed the pencil of an artist. The two magnificent Monarchs in the pride of their youth and greatness, somewhat shadowed by the eastern wall of the room; the grand and dignified form of the Cardinal, with his countenance full of thought and mind; the stern, determined aspect of Sir Payan, his whole figure possessing that sort of rigidity, indicative of a violent and continued mental effort, with the full light streaming harshly through the open casement upon his pale cheek and haggard eye, and passing on to the King's bed, and the dressing-robe he had cast off upon it, showing the strange scene in which Henry's impetuosity had caused such a conclave to be held—these objects formed the foreground; while the sergent-at-arms standing behind the prisoner, and the guard, drawn up across the doorway, completed the picture; till gliding in between the arches, the strange figure of Sir Cesar, the astrologer, with his cheeks sunken and livid, and his eye lighted up by a kind of wild maniacal fire, entered the room, and taking a place close on the right hand of Henry, added a new and curious feature to the already extraordinary scene.

We have before said, that Sir Cesar was known to the whole Court, and to Henry amongst the rest, whose opinions concerning him it is unnecessary to investigate here, changing every hour, like his opinions on many other things; sometimes thinking him mad, sometimes inspired, according to the caprice of the moment. However, Sir Cesar was a sort of privileged person, whose eccentricities were tolerated even by royalty; and thus his presence caused no surprise, and the King, without taking any notice, began to address Sir Payan Wileton.

“Sir Payan Wileton,” said Henry, “many and grievous are the crimes laid to your charge, and of which your own conscience must accuse you, as loudly as the living voices of your fellow-subjects; at least, so by the evidence brought forward against you, it appears to us, at this moment. Most of these charges we shall leave to be investigated by the common course of law; but there are some points, touching which, as they involve our own personal conduct and direction, we shall question you ourself; to which questions, we charge you, on your allegiance, to answer truly and without concealment.”

“To your Grace’s questions,” replied Sir Payan boldly, “I will answer for your pleasure, though I recognise here no established court of law: but first, I will say that the crimes charged against me, ought to be heavier than I, in my innocence, believe them, to justify the rigour with which I have been treated."

An ominous frown gathered on the King's brow. "Ha!" cried he, forgetting the calm dignity with which he had at first addressed the Knight. "No established court of law!—thou sayest well—we have not the power to question thee? Ha! who then is the King? Who is the head of all magistrates? Who holds in his hand the power of all the law? By our crown, we have a mind to assemble such a court of law, as within this half hour shall have thy head struck off upon the green."

Sir Payan was silent, and Wolsey replied to the latter part of what he had said, with somewhat more calmness than Henry had done to the former. "You have been treated, Sir," said he, "with not more rigour than you merited; nor with more than is justified by the usual current of the law. It is on affidavit before me, as Chancellor of this kingdom, that you both instigated and aided the Lady Constance de Grey, a ward of court, to fly from the protection and government of the law; and, therefore, attachment issued against your person, and you stand committed for contempt.—You had better, Sir, sue for grace and pardon, than aggravate your offence by such unbecoming demeanour.”

“Thou hast said well and wisely, my good Wolsey,” joined in the King, whose heat had somewhat subsided. “Standing thus reproved, Sir Payan Wileton, answer touching the charges you have brought against one Sir Osborne Maurice; and if you speak truly, to our satisfaction, you shall have favour and lenity at our hands.—Say, Sir, do you still hold to that accusation?”

“All I have to reply to your Grace,” answered the Knight, resolved, even if he fell himself, to work out his hatred against Sir Osborne, with that vindictive rancour, that the injurer always feels towards the injured,—“all that I have to reply is, that what I said was true; and that if I had stated all that I suspected, as well as what I knew, I should have made his treason look much blacker than it does even now.”

“Do you understand; France?” demanded

Henry, turning to Francis: "shall I translate his answers, to show you his true meaning?"

The King of France, however, signified that he comprehended perfectly; and Sir Payan, after a moment's thought, proceeded.

"I should suppose your Grace could have no doubt left upon that traitor's guilt; for the charge against him rests, not on my testimony, but upon the witness of various indifferent persons, and upon papers in the handwriting of his friends and abettors.

"Villain!" muttered Sir Cesar, between his teeth; "hypocritical, snake-like villain!" Both the King and Sir Payan heard him, but Henry merely raised his hand, as if commanding silence, while the eyes of the traitorous Knight flashed a momentary fire as they met the glance of the old man; and he proceeded, "I had no interest, your Grace, in disclosing the plot I did; though, had I done wisely, I would have held my peace, for it will make many my enemies, even many more than I dreamed of then. I have since discovered that I then only knew one half of those that are implicated.—I know them all now,” he continued, fixing his eye on Sir Cesar; “but as I find the reward that follows honesty, I shall bury the whole within my own breast.”

“On those points, Sir, we will leave our law to deal with you,” replied Henry. “There are punishments for those that conceal treason; and by my halidame, no favour shall you find in us, without you make a free and full confession,—then our grace may touch you, but not else. But to the present question, my bold Sir. Did you ever see Sir Osborne Maurice before the day that he was arrested by your order, on the charge of having excited the Cornishmen to revolt? and before God, we enjoin you—say, are you excited against him with feelings of interest, hatred, or revenge?”

“On my life,” replied Sir Payan boldly, “I never saw him but on that one day; and as I hope for salvation in heaven,” and here he made a hypocritical grimace of piety, “I have no one reason, but pure honesty, to accuse him of these crimes.”

A low groan burst from behind the tapestry at this reply; and Henry gave an angry glance towards the worthy clothier's place of concealment; but Francis, calling back his attention, begged him to ask the Knight in English, whether he had ever known Sir Osborne Maurice by any other name, or in any other character.

Sir Cesar's eyes sparkled, and Sir Payan's cheek turned pale, as Henry put the question; but he boldly replied, "Never, so help me heaven! I never saw him, or heard of him, or knew him, by any other name than Osborne Maurice."

"Oh you villainous great liar! Oh, you hypocritical thief!" shouted Jekin Groby, bolting out from behind the tapestry, unable to contain himself any longer. "I don't care, I don't care a groat for any one; but I won't hear you tell his Grace's worship such a string of lies, all as fat and as well tacked together as Christmas sausages. Lord a' mercy! I'll tell your Graces, both of you, how it was, for you don't know, that's clear.—This here Sir Osborne Maurice, that you are asking about, is neither more nor less than that Lord Darnley that I was telling your Grace of this morning. —Lord, now, didn't I hear him tell that sweet young lady, Mistress Constance de Grey, all about it ;—how he could not bear to live any longer abroad in these foreign parts, and how he had come back under the name of Sir Osborne Maurice, all for to get your Grace's love as an adventurous Knight. And then didn't that Sir Payan—yes, you great thief, you did, for I heard you—didn't he come and crow over him, and say, that now he had got him in his power? And then didn't he offer to let him go, if he would sign some papers? and then, when he would not, didn't he swear a great oath, that he would murther him, saying, 'he would make his tenure good, by the extinction of the race of Darnley?' You did, you great rogue! you know you did!—and, Lord a' mercy! to think of your going about to tell his Grace such lies—your own king, too, who should never hear any thing but the truth. God forgive you, for you 're a great sinner, and the devils will never keep company with you when you go to purgatory, but will kick you out into the other place, which is worse still, folks say.—And now, I humbly beg your Grace's pardon, and will go back again, if you like, behind the hangings ; but I couldn't abear to hear him cheat you like that."

The sudden appearance of Jekin Groby, and the light he cast upon the subject, threw the whole party into momentary confusion. Sir Payan's resolution abandoned him ; his knees shook, and his very lips grew pale. Sir Cesar gazed upon him with triumphant eyes, exclaiming, "Die, die ! what hast thou left but to die?" At the same time, Wolsey questioned Jekin Groby, who told the same straightforward tale ; and Henry explained the whole to Francis, whose comprehension of the English tongue did not quite comprise the jargon of the worthy clothier.

Sir Payan Wileton, however, resolved to make one last despairing effort, both to save himself and to ruin his enemies ; for the diabolical spirit of revenge was as deeply implanted in his bosom as that of self-preservation. He thought then, for a moment, glanced rapidly over his situation, and cast himself on his knee before the King. "Great and noble monarch," said he, in a slow impressive voice, "I own my fault—I acknowledge my crime ; but it is not such as you think it. Hear me but out, and you yourself shall judge whether you will grant me mercy, or show me rigour. I confess, then, that I had entered, as deeply as others, into the treasonable plot I have betrayed against your throne and life; nay, more, that I would never have divulged it, had I not found that the Lord Darnley had, under the name of Sir Osborne Maurice, become the Duke of Buckingham's chief agent, and was to be rewarded by the restitution of Chilham Castle, for which some vague indemnity was proposed to me hereafter. On hearing it, I dissembled my resentment, and pretending to enter more heartily than ever into the scheme, I found that the ambitious Duke reckoned, as his chief hope in case of war, the skill and chivalry of this Lord Darnley, who promised, by his hand, to seat him on the throne. I learnt, moreover, the names of all the conspirators, amongst whom that old man is one," and he pointed to Sir Cesar, who gazed upon him with a smile of contempt and scorn, whose intensity had something of sublime. "Thirsting for revenge," proceeded Sir Payan, "and with my heart full of rage, I commanded four of my servants to stop the private courier of the Duke, when I knew he was charged with letters concerning this Sir Osborne Maurice, and thus I obtained those papers I placed in the hands of my Lord Cardinal ——”

“But how shall we know they are not forgeries?” cried Henry. “Your honour, Sir, is so gone, and your testimony so suspicious, that we may well suppose those letters cunning imitations of the good Duke’s hand. We have heard of such things—ay, marry have we.”

“Herein, happily, your Grace can satisfy yourself, and prove my truth,” replied Sir Payan; “send for the servants whose names I will give, examine them, put them to the torture if you will, and if you wring not from them, that on the twenty-ninth of March, they stopped, by my command, the courier of the Duke of Buckingham, and took from him his bag of letters, condemn me to the stake. But mark me, King of England; I kneel before you pleading for life; grant it to me, with but my own hereditary property, and Buckingham with all the many traitors that are now aiming at your life, and striving for your crown, shall fall into your hand, and you shall have full evidence against them. I will instantly disclose all their names, and give you such proof against their chief, that to-morrow you can reward his treason with the axe, nor fear to be called unjust. But if you refuse me your royal promise sacredly given, here before your brother King, to yield me life, and liberty, and lands; as soon as I have fulfilled my word, I will go to my death in silence like the wolf, and never will you be able to prove any thing against them, for that letter is nothing without my testimony to point it aright."

"You are bold!" said Henry, "you are very bold! But our subjects' good, and the peace of our country, may weigh with us! What think you Wolsey?" and for a moment or two, he consulted in a low tone with the Cardinal and the King of France. "I believe, my liege," said Wolsey, whose hatred towards Buckingham was of the blindest virulence, "I believe that your Grace will never be able to prove his treasons on the Duke, without this man's help. Perhaps you had better promise."

Francis bit his lip and was silent, but Henry turning to Sir Payan, replied, "The tranquillity of our realm, and the happiness of our people, overcome our hatred to your crimes; and therefore we promise, that if by your evidence, treason worthy of death, be proved upon Edward Duke of Buckingham, you shall be free in life, in person, and in lands."

"Never!" cried the voice of Sir Cesar, mounting into a tone of thunder; "Never!" and springing forward, he caught Sir Payan by the throat, grappled with him for an instant, with a maniacal vigour, and drawing the small dagger he always carried, plunged it into the heart of the knight, with such force, that one might hear the blow of the hilt against his ribs. The whole was done in a moment, before any one was aware, and the red blood, and the dark spirit, rushing forth together, with a loud groan the traitor fell prone upon the ground: while Sir Cesar, without a moment's pause, turned the dagger against his own bosom, and drove it in up to the very haft.

Wolsey drew back in horror and affright. Francis and Henry started up, laying their hands upon their swords; Jekin Groby crept behind the arras; and the guards rushed in to seize the slayer; but Sir Cesar waved them back with the proud and dignified air of one who feels that earthly power has over him no farther sway. “What fear ye?” said he, turning to the Kings; and still holding the poniard tight against his bosom, as if to restrain the spirit from breathing forth through the wound. There is no offence in the dead or in the dying. Hear me, King of England! and hear the truth! which thou wouldst never have heard from that false caitiff. Yet I have little time—the last moments of existence speed with fast wings towards another shore—give me a seat, for I am faint.”

They instantly placed for him one of the settles, and after gazing round for a moment, with that sort of distressful vacancy of eye, that speaks how the brain reels; he made an effort, and went on, though less coherently.—“All he has said is false.—I am on the brink of another world, and I say it is false as the hell to which he is gone.—Osborne Darnley, the good, the noble, and the true—the son of my best and oldest friend, knew of no plot, heard of no treason.—He was in England but two days, when he fell into that traitor's hands.—He never saw Buckingham but once.—The Osborne Maurice named in that duke's letter, is not he—one far less worthy.”

“Who then is he?” cried the King impatiently. “Give me to know him, if you would have me believe.—Never did I hear of such a name, but in years long past, an abettor of Perkyn Warbeck. Who then is this Sir Osborne Maurice, ha? Mother of God! name him!”

“I—I—I—King of England!” cried the old man. “I, who had he been guided by me, would have taught Richard, king of England, whom you style Perkyn Warbeck, to wrench the sceptre from the hand of your usurping father—I, whose child was murdered by that dead traitor, in cold blood, after the rout at Taunton. I—I it was who predicted to Edward Bohun, that his head should be highest in the realm of England—I it is that predict it still.” As he spoke the last words, the old man suddenly drew forth the blade of the dagger from his breast, upon which a full stream of blood instantly gushed forth and deluged the ground. Still struggling with the departing spirit, he started on his feet—put his hand to his brow—“ I come! I come!” cried he—reeled—shuddered, and fell dead beside his enemy.

CHAPTER XIV.

“ They all as glad as birds of joyous prime Thence led her forth, about her dancing round.”

SPENSER.

THE bustle, the confusion, the clamour, the questions, and the explanations that ensued, we shall leave the reader to imagine, satisfied that his vivid fancy will do far more justice to such a scene than our worn-out pen.—When the bodies of Sir Payan Wileton and his companion in death, had been removed from the chamber of the King, and some sand strewed upon the ground to cover the gory memories that such deeds had left behind, order and tranquillity began to regain their dominion.

“ By my faith, a bloody morning’s entertainment have we had,” said Francis. “ But you are happy, my good brother of England, in having traitors that will thus despatch each other, and cheat the headsman of his due. However, from what I have gathered, Osborne Darnley, the Knight of Burgundy, can no longer seem a traitor in the eyes of any one."

"No, truly, my gracious Lord," replied Wolsey, willing to please the King of France. "He stands freed from all spot or blemish, and well deserves the kingly love of either noble monarch."

"Slife! my good Lord Cardinal," cried Henry, "speak for yourself alone! Now I say, on my soul, he is still a most deep and egregious traitor. Not only, like that Sir Payan Wileton, in having planned his treason, but in having executed it."

"Nay, how so?" cried Francis, startled at this new charge. "In what is he a traitor now?"

"In having aided Francis King of France," replied Henry, smiling, "to storm our Castle of Guisnes, and take his liege Lord and Sovereign, prisoner."

"Oh, if that be the case," cried Francis, "I give him up to your royal indignation ; but still we have a boon to ask, which our gracious brother will not refuse.”

“ Name it ! name it ! ” exclaimed Henry. “ By St. Mary, it shall go to pay our ransom, whatever it be.”

“ You have in your court,” replied Francis, “ one Lady Constance de Grey, who though your born subject, is no less vassal to the crown of France ; owing homage for the counties of Boissy and the Val de Marne, assured to your late subject the Lord de Grey, by Charles the Eighth, when he gave him in marriage Constance Countess of Boissy, as a reward for services rendered in Italy—”

“ We see your object, O most Christian King ! ” cried Henry, laughing. “ We see your object ! What, what, a messenger of Cupid are you ? Well, have your wish. We give her to your Highness, so to dispose of as you may think fit ; but at the same time, claim Lord Osborne Darnley at your hands, to punish according to his demerits. What say you ? ha ! ”

“ Agreed, agreed ! ” replied the King of France. "He waits me, as I said even now, in the corridor without, and doubtless thinks I sue for him in vain. Those guards must have passed him in the corridor."

"No, no! they came the other way," said Henry. "Ho! without there! Sergeant-at-arms, take four stout halbardiers, and going into the west corridor, attach me for high treason the Lord Osborne Darnley, whom you will there find waiting. Hist! hear me, man. Use him with all gentleness, (we do but jest with him,) and make some fair excuse to shut him up in one of the chambers of the new palace, the nearer to the great hall the better. Away! make speed, and above all return quick, and let me know where you have put him; but take heed, and let him not see that we mock him—haste!—My good Lord Cardinal," he continued, turning to Wolsey, "though it be an unmeet task, for one of your grave dignity, to bear a message to a lady, yet on this day of joy, when our good brother France comes here to greet us in brotherly love, even wise men shall forget their seriousness, and be as gay as boys. Hie then, good Wolsey, to our Lady Queen. Tell her to call all the fair flowers of England round about her in our great hall, to welcome Francis of France, and that we will be there immediately upon your steps.”

The Cardinal bowed low, and instantly obeyed; and Henry proceeded in whispering consultation with Francis till the return of the sergeant-at-arms, then turning to the worthy clothier, who, when he found all the killing and slaying was over, had come out from behind the arras, to enjoy the air of royalty, “Come good, Jekin,” cried Henry, “now a task for thee—hark, man;” and he whispered something to honest Groby, who instantly replied, “Lord a’ mercy, yes, your Grace! I know Wilson Goldsmith well; I’ll go to him directly—no trouble in life—Lord, I guess how it’s going to be—well, I’m vastly glad, I do declare. Lord a’ mercy! I hope your Grace’s worship will let me be there!”

“Ay, man, ay!” cried the King, “make speed, and come with him. Ho, Snell! give me a gown of tissue—bid the guard be ready, we will cross the green to the palace. Let the marshals be called to clear the way.”

In a very few minutes all was prepared, and as the two Kings were descending the grand staircase of the castle, news was brought that a band of French nobles, anxious for the safety of their king, had come over from Ardres at all speed to seek him. Francis sent his commands that they should dismount in the court; and on issuing out of the castle, the Monarch found a splendid party of the English and French nobility mingled together, waiting to give them the good morrow.

“Ha, Alençon, what fear you, man?” cried the King of France. “We are all safe. Sir Richard Heartley, look not for Lord Darnley, he is in security: follow, and you will see him presently.”

“Gentlemen all, you are most welcome,” said Henry; “follow us all that love us, to our poor palace, here without; and we will make you better cheer, where ladies’ words shall replace this summer air, and their sweet looks the sunshine. Sound on before!”

The trumpets sounded, and the ushers and marshals clearing the way for the two Kings, they passed out of the castle gate, and traversed the green on foot, amidst the shouts and acclamations of the crowd, that the arrival of the French nobles, together with various rumours of something extraordinary having happened, had collected in the neighbourhood of the royal lodging.

Arm in arm with Francis, Henry delighting, with ostentatious magnificence, to show himself to the people, passed round to the front of the palace; and entering the court which we have already described, he proceeded at once to the great hall, called the hall of the cloth of silver, to which on the announcement of his intentions by Wolsey, the Queen had hastily summoned all the elect of the court. On the entrance of the Kings, with all the train of noblemen who had followed them, a temporary confusion ensued, while Francis was presented to the Queen of England, and Henry whispered to her a few brief hints of what had taken place.

“ Room, room, Lords and Ladies,” cried he at length, “ let us have space.”

“ There would not be space enough for him in the world, if he had his will,” whispered Lady Katrine Bulmer to Constance de Grey, who stood by her side, unwillingly appearing in such a meeting. “ On my life, Constance, his eye is fixed upon us. Now, what would I give to be King, if it were but to outstare him.”

“ The Lady Constance de Grey !” said Henry, in a loud tone, “ we would speak with the Lady de Grey.”

“ Nay, speak gently,” said the Queen. “ Good, my Lord, you will frighten her. Constance, come hither to the Queen, your friend !”

With a pale cheek, and a beating heart, Constance advanced to the side of the Queen, and bending her eyes upon the ground awaited in silence, not daring to look around.

“ Fear not, fair one,” said Henry, “ we are not angry, but only sorry to lose you. Here is our noble brother, Francis of France, claims you as his vassal, at our hands.” Constance looked up, and saw the King of France's eye bent on her with a smile that gave her courage. "Now, notwithstanding the great love we bear him," continued Henry, "we might have resisted his demand, inasmuch as you are our born subject, had you not shown some slight perverseness against our repeated commands. We therefore must, and will resign you into his hands, unless you instantly agree to receive such lord to be your husband, as we shall judge fitting for your rank and station."

"Oh, no! no, my Lord!" cried Constance, clasping her hands, and forgetting, in her fear of fresh persecution, the crowd by which she was surrounded. "Force me not, I beseech your Grace, to wed against my will."

"You see!" said Henry turning to the King of France, with a smile, "you see the lady is headstrong! Take her, my good Brother; I give her up to you. There, sweetheart, is your Lord and Sovereign; see if you can obey him better."

Francis took the fair girl by the hand, and bending down his head, said in a kindly tone,—

“Lady, fear not. Lift up your eyes, and tell me if there is one in all this circle you would make your choice.”

“No, indeed, my Lord,” faltered forth Constance, without looking round; “all I ask is to be left in peace.”

“If you have ever seen any one to whom you could give your heart, tell me,” said Francis.—Constance was silent. “Then I am to judge that you have not,” continued the King; “so I will choose for you.”

Constance raised her eyes with a supplicating look; but Francis’s face was turned away towards Henry, who with a laughing glance had taken the Queen by the hand, and was leading her towards one of the doors.

“Come, we must follow,” cried Francis. “Lord Cardinal, we shall need your company.”

Constance gazed round with doubt and apprehension, but Francis led her forward immediately after the King and Queen of England, whispering as they went,—“Fear not, sweet lady; you are with a friend that knows all.”

The whole court followed along one of the splendid galleries of the palace, preceded by Henry and Katherine, who stopped, however, before a door, from before which a page held back the hangings, and—"Here," said the King of England, putting a key into Francis's hand—"here you take precedence—this is the cage, and here is the fetter-maker," pointing to a respectable-looking merchant in a long furred robe, who stood with Jekin Groby in a niche hard by.

More and more confused, not knowing what to fear or what to believe, the very uncertainty made Constance's heart sink, more than actual danger would have done;—but still the King of France led her forward, even before Queen Katherine, and, putting the key in the lock, threw open the door, and drew her gently in: when the first object that met her sight, was Osborne Darnley, with his arms folded on his breast, standing before the high altar of a splendid chapel.—Her heart beat—eyes grew dim—her brain reeled; and she would have fallen fainting to the ground, but Darnley started forward and clasped her to his heart.

"Nay nay, this is too much!" cried the Queen advancing; "see, the poor girl faints.

My good Lord, indeed this must not be to-day.—It has been too much for her already. Some day before the two courts part, we will pray my good Lord Cardinal to speak a blessing on their love. Bear her into the sacristy, Sir Osborne. Katrine Bulmer, giddy namesake, help your friend, while I pray their Graces both to return into the hall.”
